That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have printed and to keep on hand United States Treasury notes under a special account to be called the "emergency circulation fund." Such notes shall be full legal tender. Any citizen of the United States shall have the right to deposit United States bonds under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to receive from such fund 90 per cent of the face value of such bonds in United States Treasury notes, and shall have the right at any time within twelve months to redeem such bonds by repaying in United States Treasury notes the amount so received by him on account of such bonds, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum on such amount. Failure to redeem such bonds within the limit of twelve months shall operate as a forfeiture of such bonds to the United States, and such bonds shall be sold to the highest bidder in the open market, and the balance, after the payment of the principal of the amount advanced, the interest on the same, and the expenses, shall be paid to the former owner of such bonds. Any moneys received from such sale may be exchanged with other moneys in the Treasury so that this fund shall consist alone of Treasury notes. The principal of all sums so advanced when repaid shall be returned to the "emergency circulation fund," and all interest upon such sums shall be passed to the credit of the Treasury under miscellaneous receipts.

The actual amount of notes held in the "emergency circulation fund" shall never be less than $50,000,000 in excess of any outstanding advances. Said fund shall neither be increased nor diminished except in the manner provided.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the amendment then proposed by Senator Jones contains every essential feature which now gives value to Senate bill 3023, reported by the Committee on Finance, and just in degree as the committee bill has departed from the principles of this original proposition, just in that degree has it lost value.

The original proposition provided for United States notes directly, and not the awkward, irksome, obstructive use of the pretended national bank notes of 6,600 intermediary national banks.

The original proposition provided that any citizen of the United States had the right to obtain emergency notes upon proper security of bonds, while the committee measure denies the citizen and denies 18,000 banks and trust companies and only permits some of the national banks to have this right, and only permits such special national banks to have a very limited amount of such notes, under additional restrictions by States, which, in my judgment, greatly diminishes the value of the proposed remedy. The restrictions go further and limit the amount of notes given to particular States, which is a serious additional restriction upon the means of escape from the danger of financial panic by emergency notes.

The original proposition compelled the return of the emergency notes within twelve months, which the committee measure does not do, and loses force by not making the return of emergency notes necessary and compulsory within a given time.

The original proposition provided that the emergency currency should never be "less than fifty millions in excess of any outstanding advances;" in other words, it was not limited, as the committee measure now proposes, to the inadequate sum, as I shall presently show, of $500,000,000. It took over two thousand million dollars to meet this last panic, and then the panic was not successfully met.

The original proposition imposed a tax of 6 per cent on such emergency notes, as does the committee measure now submitted.

The original proposition allowed emergency notes to the extent of 90 per cent in emergency notes of the face value of such bonds (United States bonds) and the committee measure, in like manner, provides 90 per cent in emergency notes of the value of bonds offered as security.

The committee measure enlarges the volume of securities available, which, I think, is highly judicious and proper.

You will observe, Mr. President, that this proposition then submitted to the Senate contains the very essence of the bill now under discussion. It proposed bond-secured currency advanced upon the security of bonds under a tax of 6 per cent per annum, and that the advance should not exceed 90 per cent of the value of such bonds.

Mr. President, if the chairman of the Committee on Finance had, at that time, 1900, been conscious of the great value of the suggestion contained in the then proposed amendment, he was in a position, at that time, to have written into the statutes of the United States the very safeguards against panic which he now, with such force, declares essential. If he had then patiently listened to this suggestion he would have saved the people and the business interests of the United States what he himself now describes as the "most acute and disastrous panic which has ever occurred in the history of the United States."

I pause to say that, if any Senator [looking at Mr. ALDRICH] wishes to interrupt me at any time, it will not disconcert me in the least.

The Senator from Rhode Island would have saved his country and millions of its people the enormous shrinkage of values of securities and property and the loss from injury to business resulting from and incidental to the crisis amounting, as he himself now declares, "to thousands of millions of dollars."

He would have prevented "the suspension or disarrangement of business operations which threw thousands of men out of employment and reduced the wages of those who were still employed."

He would have prevented the fear and distrust which has now paralyzed and makes unproductive the energies of hundreds of thousands of men and holds idle many thousands of factories and business enterprises.

Mr. President, I rejoice that the principle of good government and of sound finance which was presented then has now been adopted by the Committee on Finance and is about to become established as a part of our law.

I trust the Senator from Rhode Island will agree with me now that if the present plan of emergency money had been provided in 1900 by the amendment he was then unwilling to accept we would have avoided the enormous injury of the panic of 1907–8.

I regret, however, that in adopting the principles which were submitted in the amendment proposed to the financial bill of 1900 the Senator from Rhode Island has not improved the original suggestion, but has weakened its effectiveness in various important ways, as I shall hereafter point out.

I submit my observations on the pending measure, Mr. President, in the earnest hope that they may persuade the Senator from Rhode Island and other Senators of this body to consider the present bill with dispassionate care and without economic prejudgment and with the greatest thoroughness before it is finally passed, so that the bill when completed shall be drawn as perfectly as the wisdom and patriotism of this body make possible.

Mr. President, this Congress has abundant time in which to perfect this bill. There is no need for haste, and those expressions in the public prints when Congress met, that there was no need for haste, met my approval, because I have observed that, if there is one thing which has been thoroughly well established, it is a perfect divergence of opinion on every kind of proposition relating to this question. The only thing which has been thoroughly well established, I think, is lack of knowledge and of coherent opinion on the part of many of the statesmen of this country with regard to this great remedial legislation now proposed. This condition of uncertainty justifies and it imposes the duty upon every man who owes allegiance to his State and who represents his State on this floor, to study this great question and determine it according to those correct principles which have been demonstrated by those older nations of the world, who, under their experience, have learned a lesson which our younger nation appears not yet to have acquired. Congress has not only abundant time, but it has at its disposal every essential fact upon which to make up its judgment.

It not only has the time and facts available, but it has all the wisdom and intelligence necessary for the framing of a perfect statute, and I earnestly insist that the measure to be adopted by the Senate of the United States shall be drawn so as to remedy at least those defects in our present national banking act which are perfectly palpable and obvious to every thoughtful student of finance.

THE PRINCIPAL CAUSES OF PANIC.

Mr. President, in drawing a measure of relief against panic, which this bill avowedly is, it is of the highest importance to determine what the causes of the panic are. I do not sympathize with the chairman of the Committee on Finance when he speaks of the causes of panic being an academic question. It is a practical business question, upon which this Senate has a right to have all of the facts available; but there are some facts which are so patent that they need no assistance to be made perfectly clear to the knowledge of this body. When the causes are clearly discovered, a remedy can be more easily provided. I shall, therefore, endeavor to point out the principal causes of panic.

The primary cause of panic is the fear of the people of the insolvency of the banks.

The real cause of a panic is when the depositors, who number millions upon millions of people, go into a bank, draw out their small deposits of forty or fifty or a hundred dollars, carry them home, lock them up in a trunk, and hide them away. There is the chief evil of a panic. The depositors drew out of the New York banks two hundred millions of dollars within a week, and they drew out of the banks of the country an infinitely greater sum. I have felt great pride in the people of Oklahoma that they had the nerve to stand firm and not withdraw in any serious way their money for hoarding.

The causes leading to the fear of the people are:

First. The rumors of bear manipulators alleging "tight money," "high interest," and "impending panic," and rumors of threatened insolvency of banks, caused and promoted by those engaged in the manufacture of bear markets, and of panics, whether small or great, as a chief agency in compelling a bear market. These rumors and thousands of others intended to disturb confidence flow in endless stream from the gamblers on the stock exchange, the great panic breeder.

Second. These rumors have sound foundation if those engaged in producing panic are strong enough to cause tight money, high interest, and the constriction of credits in the great money centers; if they can and do withdraw at will millions for hoarding; or if they can and do call "demand loans" for immediate payment, when they have already put a strict limit on the extension of credits by the great controlling banks; if they force into bankruptcy and ruin individuals, banks, and trust companies, or commercial enterprises whose property they covet, they can cause insolvency and produce that fear in the minds of the people which causes hoarding and panic.

Third. These rumors, causing the fear of the people, easily gain force, because—

(a) The banks know that the country's reserves in New York are tied up in gambling operations on the stock exchange in so-called "quick assets" but which are not really available to any great extent (because it would mean panic to force the quick liquidation of such loans). There is a world of men who have "got to be helped" in such times, as the bankers say, and those loans are carried over.

(b) The banks know there is only 7½ per cent of money in total reserves in all of the banks in the United States in currency, and that if the fear of the people is aroused, and that if 5 per cent of their depositors demanded their deposits in any one week there would be a fearful panic, and the banker's fear is hypnotic of the people and excites the fear of the people in ways too numerous to mention—e. g., by

1. Refusing good loans, well secured.
2. Forcing solvent debtors to urgent settlement.
3. Talking hard times and tight money, etc.

All of those things make the banker himself the medium of emphasizing these conditions and bringing about the very condition which creates and makes panics. Any business man in this Senate knows that I speak the truth when I call attention to these things. I have helped guide the leading bank in my State through two panics, and I understand the anxieties, and I think I understand the causes of panics.

(c) The banks know that the 15 and 25 per cent reserve in lawful money is largely artificial and does not exist in lawful money, as a matter of fact, and that their showing of reserves is only a pretense of a strength that does not exist.

These sentimental influences lead with certainty to the fear of the people, and then we have as the final consequence the deadly evil of the hoarding of currency by the common people. Fourteen dollars so hoarded by each one of the people would not leave a dollar apiece in any one of the 23,000 banks of the United States.

The hoarding by the common people, Mr. President, is not the primary cause of panic, although a secondary cause, which intensifies and makes panic peculiarly dangerous. Hoarding is the effect as well as cause of panic. It is the necessary immediate consequence of fear or panic and becomes a factor in panic of supreme importance.

Fear is the soul of a panic, and fear may be founded on any of a number of things.

It may be due to some national calamity which paralyzes credit and excites public alarm.

It may be due to the wholesale speculative loans of the depositors' money, or to distrust engendered in the integrity of the financial world from any cause. In 1893 the panic was artificially produced by circular letters sent out all over the country suggesting the constriction of credits; by repeated suggestions in the public press that the European investor was selling American securities; that gold was leaving the country; that the gold reserve was going down day by day, and that we were on the very verge of panic.

If you tell a depositor in a great variety of ways, and with sufficient insistency, that we are on the verge of a panic, finally the more timid of the depositors will actually withdraw their deposits for hoarding, and when this takes place the bankers take fright, and the alarm passes like an electric shock from man to man until the depositors who are poor or cowardly take out their deposits for hoarding on a vast scale.

The cause of the panic of 1907 in like manner was very similar. It was the result of a high market in stocks and bonds steadily manipulated for several years, raising the booming cry of "prosperity" and exciting the people into speculative buying of stocks, and then the change of tune and the reiterated talk and suggestion of panic made either by those who had in view the creation of panic and its consequent benefits to them, by those called "bear operators" or the bigger men whose satellites they are, or to the thoughtless talk of people who were indifferent to the result or ignorant of the hypnotic power which repeated public suggestion exercises over the minds of the people.

These constant suggestions of impending panic were sufficient to create a panic regardless of other contributing causes, and it is well known to everybody that these continued suggestions finally led to a general belief that a panic was impending. As a necessary consequence there was more or less disturbance in the mind of the average depositor, and only some incident, such as the Knickerbocker Trust run, was necessary to start a violent panic under conditions of general apprehension stirred up in this way.

The causes of panic, Mr. President, which excite the fear of the people may be various, but the fear of the depositor, from whatever cause, is the real factor with which we must deal.

The fear of the depositor must be abated if we wish to prevent hoarding of the currency, which is so essential to the stability of our commerce, to the healthfulness of our banking institutions, and to the welfare of our business people.

Two things are essential to prevent the fear of the depositor:

(a) He must be assured that his deposit is safe, even if the bank be found insolvent, and this remedy may be easily, economically, and abundantly provided by a guaranty fund available from the taxes now paid into the United States Treasury by the national banks on their circulation. It is thirty-five times more than is necessary, according to our statistics.

(b) It is not entirely enough to satisfy the depositor that his deposit is safe against the insolvency of the bank of deposit, but he must be assured that he can get his money in currency whenever he wants it.

Banks confessedly solvent in the last panic, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, about 23,000 of them, although solvent, refused to pay currency to their depositors for the simple reason, Mr. President, that the banks of the United States have only about $7.50 with which to pay $100 of their deposits, if the depositors should suddenly want their money in currency. The banks know this in a general way, and for that reason when New York suspended currency payment in October last almost every bank from the Atlantic to the Pacific followed this example within twenty-four hours. New York held the reserves of the banks of the United States, and when New York refused currency other banks felt compelled to do so.

The banks of Oklahoma, Mr. President, paid $40 a thousand to New York banks for currency when the New York banks had on hand the reserves of the Oklahoma banks.

I believe, however, that the New York banks went out into the open market on the street and bought hoarded currency; I do not think they took it from their own money. So that they are not to be understood as speculating upon their correspondents. I believe they did the best they could under a very bad condition.

Mr. President, the first essential is the security of the bank depositor.

The second essential is emergency circulation, and both are essentials to the stability of our commerce.

Under our present banking system the national-bank deposits are entirely safe, but the ordinary depositor does not realize this.

The report of the Comptroller of the Currency, 1907, page 28, shows the net loss to creditors of the insolvent banks since 1898, as follows:

1900	None.
1903	34,458
1906	None.

An average of about $85,000 per annum against net deposits, August 22, 1907, $5,256,000,000, a loss to the national-bank depositors of only about one dollar in sixty thousand dollars per annum.

There never was in the history of man a finer record of integrity, of intelligence, and of good business than is shown by this record of the national banks, and this country has a right to be proud of that record.

If the future losses should average thirty-five times this amount annually, the present tax on circulation paid by the national banks would be more than sufficient to meet it, because—and I call your attention to the fact—2 per cent on over six hundred million dollars makes an annual tax on the national-bank circulation of more than three million dollars with which to pay the average loss of eighty-five thousand dollars. The depositors are safe now comparatively, and it is only for the moral effect after all that the insurance of these deposits will prove to the country to be of great value.

The security of the bank depositor (by permitting the present tax on circulation to be used for the insurance of his deposit) would prevent such depositor from losing confidence and hoarding his deposit.

There would be a much smaller need for emergency circulation if this self-insurance plan were provided. The emergency currency is intended to restore to circulation the money withdrawn from commerce and hoarded by the frightened depositor. If the depositor has the assurance of safety in his deposit he will not be frightened and he will not hoard his money, and there will be, probably, but little need for emergency currency.

Both provisions, however, Mr. President, I regard as essential, because the national banks comprise only 6,600 institutions out of 23,000 banks. The national banks have only one-third of the banking deposits of the country, and emergency currency is necessary, therefore, to protect the country against the fear and the consequent hoarding of the depositors of the other banking institutions of the country who keep their reserves with the national banks.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Has the law of Oklahoma for the guaranty of deposits been put into operation?

Mr. OWEN. It has.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to ask the Senator how it has operated as respects the situation of the national banks? As I understand, the law is applicable only to the State banks.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator is mistaken with regard to the law being applicable only to the State banks. It is also applicable to national banks where they choose to use their undivided profits for the purpose of buying insurance under the State plan, which, I think, they can do by the consent of their stockholders.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, if the Senator will pardon the interruption, as he is evidently an expert in practical banking matters, what would be the effect upon the national banks of Oklahoma provided they were not permitted to take shelter under that State law?

Mr. OWEN. It depends upon the condition of the bank. If there is a national bank in a small town where there is no State bank, it would not affect it. If in a small town there are national banks, and there is a little State bank across the street with a big sign in gold letters that its deposits are guaranteed, it would make the national bank lose deposits, and the national bank would be compelled to take out a State charter. If, however, in a larger town, where a national bank was thoroughly well established and its lines of business long continued, such as the bank with which I have had the honor to be connected—the First National Bank of Muskogee—I do not think it would have any appreciable effect.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, if it will not interrupt the Senator, what practical effect would it have on State and private banking institutions of the country if a national law should guarantee the solvency of national bank deposits?

Mr. OWEN. If that were done it would impose upon the State the duty of doing that which I now insist this Government should do—insuring the deposits of national banks or providing for self-insurance. If this Government should now pass an act insuring the deposits out of the tax proposed—it is self-insurance by the banks, not insurance by the Government—if that were done, it would then have the effect upon State banks such as the Oklahoma law now has on national banks. In the substitute which I have proposed, I have arranged that it shall not go into operation for two years, so as to give opportunity to the other States in the Union to establish a similar insurance plan within their respective limits. The substitute which I have proposed only goes into immediate operation where the State has already established a plan of insurance for the State banks.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me one more question, I will not interrupt him any further.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OWEN. I will be delighted to answer.

Mr. DOLLIVER. What effect would it have upon solid, conservative, well-managed banks if an act of Congress were to put all national banks upon exactly the same level so far as their ability to pay their depositors is concerned? What effect would that have upon the solvent, well-managed banks as against irresponsible, or more or less irresponsible and speculative banking institutions, offering large sums as interest upon deposits, and otherwise making themselves attractive to the community?

Mr. OWEN. I am delighted to have the Senator ask the question, and I think I can answer it. The Senator from Iowa assumes that there is a class of speculative, reckless bankers under no restraint who might rush in and acquire the deposits of the unsuspecting. By what argument is a deposit to be brought to a bank conducted by a speculator or a reckless, irresponsible man? Everybody who is acquainted with the banking business knows that the depositor first wants to know above all other things that the bank at least is conducted in a conservative and in a reasonable and proper manner, and when a depositor makes——

Mr. DOLLIVER rose.

Mr. OWEN. I will answer the question if the Senator will permit me. I have not gotten to the answer yet. I am laying my premises. I will answer it if the Senator will have patience. He has asked me a question and I will answer it to his satisfaction, unless he wants to ask me another question.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I just desired an answer to my question.

Mr. OWEN. I am going to answer the Senator's question completely.

You are assuming in your question that the irresponsible, reckless banker is going to attract the depositor. I therefore go directly to the causes which lead a depositor to make his deposit. What are those causes? The first thing he wants to know is that the banker is a decent and an honorable man, and under our system of banking we have the most abundant provisions thrown around the ordinary banker. I take it that the State of Iowa has a proper law requiring a reasonable control and requiring reasonable compliance with those provisions found necessary to sound banking.

But I want to call attention to the fact that under our system of government any man who is guilty of fraud as a banker is guilty of a criminal offense, and is restrained by the criminal code. Under the substitute which I have suggested here, the insurance plan only goes to the noninterest-bearing deposits and the man who wants to invite into the bank deposits by giving interest and paying people to make deposits with him, the deposit being otherwise guaranteed, has no foundation on earth to invite those deposits except his own bad character; and that is not a good magnet with which to attract deposits. When he established his bank he must comply in the first place with the law and he must put up his money to establish his bank. The smallest of the national banks must have $25,000 of capital and the stockholders are liable for a like amount, making a bond of $50,000 standing between the depositor and loss. Therefore these objections which are made that it will encourage reckless banking have no genuine foundation.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. OWEN. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether he knows of any State in the history of our Government that has guaranteed deposits except his own?

Mr. OWEN. I do not know of any State that has guaranteed deposits. I understand in the history of the past that there have been some such experiences, which were based upon an insufficient foundation.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that as I am informed the State of New York once tried an experiment of that kind, extending over a period of about twelve years, and that it resulted most disastrously to that part of the safety fund, and that they failed to raise enough to pay the bad debts of the banks which were members of that so-called organization, and that they fell shy several million dollars of being able to pay out finally.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator from Michigan will make his suggestion sufficiently definite I will undertake to get the statistics and account for the reason why they failed, but I am now talking about a modern condition and I am not talking about the poor and ineffective kind of government we had in the days of our ancestors.

Mr. SMITH. For the information of the Senator from Oklahoma, if he is willing——

Mr. OWEN. I am delighted.

Mr. SMITH. I may further say that the legislature of the State of New York did, under considerable pressure, pass a law providing that all banks seeking recharter and all banks newly organized should contribute to a safety fund one-third of 1 per cent upon their capital, and that from that source for a period of twelve years a large fund was set aside for the purpose of paying the bad debts of the banks of that State. As I said a moment ago, that ran along from perhaps 1830 to 1845, when the statute was repealed, the practice was discontinued, and banking was left, as it ought to be left, to the individual initiative and to the individual responsibilty or the corporate responsibility, whichever you may see fit to denominate it.

Mr. OWEN. That is no doubt an interesting historical circumstance. It arose in a time when there were no railroads, when there was no means of communication, when it took a week to get a letter from one end of New York to the other, when there were no newspapers worth mentioning, no telephone, no telegraph, no public schools, a very defective Government; when they had no sufficient and proper means of examination of the banks; and we have to go back to such conditions in order to justify us in adopting the experiences of that date as a guide for the present. There is no true parallel. To-day we have the most perfect banking system in the world in the national banks of this country, I think. Their losses to their creditors during the last nine years have averaged only about one dollar in seventy thousand a year. There were losses of eighty-five thousand per annum only, out of nearly six thousand million of deposits; and shall we go back and point to 1830, the days of our great grandfathers, and have it said that we shall not avail ourselves of modern knowledge and modern appliances? We have improved since that day, and we can improve still more.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest that when the Senator from Oklahoma undertakes the New York investigation, if he will extend his research a little, he will find that the State of Michigan once enacted almost precisely the same kind of law in regard to the insurance of State bank notes, and that it failed.

Mr. OWEN. That justifies the Senator from Michigan. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. It may justify the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. There are some obvious defects in our national banking system, which have been factors in producing the panic of 1907–8, which ought to be remedied. For example—

(a) The tying up of the resources and reserves of the banks of the United States in loans for speculative purposes when their resources should be available for legitimate commerce, for manufacturing and industrial enterprises, for moving the agricultural, mineral, and manufactured products of the country.

(b) The loaning of funds to active officers of a bank without proper safeguards should be forbidden.

(c) The cash reserves should be strengthened.

All of these things are advisable safeguards against panics, and should be provided for now while a bill is pending the declared purpose of which is to prevent panic.

Mr. President, I wish to point out clearly what the bill reported by the Finance Committee contains and in what way it is objectionable in its present form.

Second, Mr. President, I wish to point out what this bill ought to contain and what the substitute therefor, which I propose to submit as an amendment, does contain.

WHAT THE COMMITTEE BILL CONTAINS.

First. Mr. President, while the committee bill recognizes the importance of emergency money, it limits the issue to $500,000,000 of emergency notes, which has been demonstrated with great force by the chairman himself to be insufficient in volume, and then imposes restrictions that will prevent any but a fractional issue of the volume suggested, and closes every door to relief until the Secretary of the Treasury declares an emergency. The Secretary of the Treasury should have no authority to refuse relief or to defer it because within a few days irreparable damage may be done the bank on which a heavy run may be precipitated.

You take such a case as that of the run on the National Bank of Commerce in Kansas City, a bank which had nearly $40,000,000 of resources and which stood up and paid $18,000,000 to its depositors before it pulled down its flag in surrender. There was a case where an emergency might not be declared by the Secretary of the Treasury as a national matter, and yet it was an emergency of a critical character for that great institution and for the entire Southwest. The remedy ought to be left wide open so that any bank that wants relief shall be able to get it, and get relief immediately.

Second. The committee bill makes the emergency notes national-bank notes in form, requiring 6,600 varieties of notes without sound reason, when these notes are really made United States notes payable in gold or its equivalent.

Third. The national banking associations are not permitted to take advantage of this bill unless they come within certain rigidly described classes, thus limiting the efficiency of the proposed remedy and preventing its full and free exercise.

(a) No national banking association which has less circulating notes outstanding than 50 per cent of its capital is permitted to have the benefit of relief against panic.

(b) No national bank which has a surplus of less than 20 per cent is permitted to have relief against panic.

(c) In no event is any national bank to have any relief in emergency notes exceeding a gross amount of its outstanding notes, whether normal or emergency, in excess of the capital and surplus of such bank.

(d) Even under these unnecessary, vexatious, reactionary limitations, the national banks within the classes described are only permitted to have relief of a limited amount of these emergency notes, apportioned off to each of the several States, regardless of the national exigency.

Fourth. No State bank, no trust company, no savings bank, no private bank, is permitted to have the benefit of this remedy against panic, although holding two-thirds of the banking capital of the United States and less than 4 per cent currency reserve, and, therefore, peculiarly dangerous to our financial stability.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I wish to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he intends to make any observations with reference to the limitation on the issue to the various States? If not, I should like to ask him a question, as I am somewhat in accord with him in reference to the matter of limiting the issue to the entire country.

Mr. OWEN. California could get only twelve million dollars under this bill.

Mr. FLINT. I understand. But assuming that a condition existed like that in the last panic and there is this limitation of $500,000,000, and the currency is all issued in the State of New York, California would not get any.

Mr. OWEN. It would under my plan, but it would be better to supply enough to New York to prevent panic in the first place, and still not deny California what it needed.

Mr. FLINT. If the stock market were eliminated, I would be perfectly willing to provide in this bill that the amount of currency should not be limited. But if a condition should arise such as existed in the late panic, I think it should be limited as to the States, so that the entire amount should not be issued to the banks in the State of New York.

Mr. OWEN. I shall discuss that further along. But I will in brief make this answer: I do not think the emergency currency should be limited in issue at all. If New York needs $500,000,000, I think New York ought to have $500,000,000, without denying to San Francisco one hundred million at the same time, if it proved to be necessary. Why is this relief denied? What is the purpose of it? We are trying to provide against panics, are we not? What is the sense, the common sense, of denying a sufficient issue to make panics impossible?

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. While we are desirous of stopping panics, it may be that we are not desirous of encouraging a condition of affairs in the New York stock market where speculators will have this money issued and go on and deal in stocks and have the prices advance four or five times their real value, which has been the result when the money has all been concentrated in the city of New York. The purpose of this bill, as I understand, is to prevent such a condition, and the reason the amount is left to the Secretary of the Treasury or to the commission composed of the Comptroller and the Secretary of the Treasury is that the New York banks can not themselves determine when they will promote stock-gambling propositions with this money, but rather that the money shall be used to stop panics throughout the country and to relieve a condition that we know exists in the West, and not only in the West, but in the South, each year; and that is that we require more money at certain periods of the year. If this was not left to the Secretary of the Treasury, and if it was left unlimited, the entire amount, as I have said, would be issued in the city of New York at times and not used to stop a panic, but used to continue a stock-gambling operation that has existed there from time to time.

Mr. OWEN. The purposes of the Senator from California and my own are the same. We are in exact accord in purpose. The proposed substitute that I offer does not limit the emergency issue to $500,000,000. It puts no limit on it. The limit proposed is the necessity of the country alone. In this last panic we required more than a thousand millions. The estimate made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance overlooks the most important item. We required over a thousand millions in this last panic, and that did not control it. Why shall we now limit it to five hundred millions, and then limit that amount in such a manner as not to make it available where it is required?

More than that I agree with the Senator from California with regard to the control of the New York Stock Exchange, and I introduced a bill to-day proposing to remedy that evil in some degree; that bill proposes that no Stock Exchange quotations shall have access to our national mails except under the supervision and control of the Department of Commerce and Labor under proper safeguards to prevent gambling and fraud. That will put a stop to the gambling which robs the innocent and unprotected in this country.

But I propose more in this substitute which I offer now to the Senate. I propose that the New York Stock Exchange gambling shall be limited by a provision on this bill forbidding the national banks to use their depositors' money in making loans for the speculative buying of stocks and bonds on that market. They recently tied up all our national reserves when they were needed to move the cotton crop; the wheat crop; needed to run the factories of New England and needed to run the coal mines and the great works in Pennsylvania and the other eastern States. It is high time that this country was advised as to its rights and that the Senate should put a stop to such practices; and I believe from the opinions which I know the Senator himself entertains from his questions that he will be in accord at least with the purposes of the suggestions I make.

Mr. FLINT. I am not prepared to commit myself to the measure, but I am prepared to commit myself to the views.

Mr. OWEN. I said the purposes, Mr. President.

Mr. FLINT. I want to ask the Senator another question, as he has given some study to this matter and as he now refers to the condition of affairs in the New York market and the loan of money there deposited by the various banks throughout the country. I desire to ask him whether or not he has given any study to the conditions that have existed since the panic, to ascertain whether the same banks which complained that they could not obtain their money from the banks in New York have not again deposited the money in New York, and are doing it now, so that they have to-day a far larger percentage on deposit in the New York banks than the condition of the country would justify.

Mr. SMOOT. More than they had before.

Mr. FLINT. And more than they had before.

Mr. OWEN. I think that undoubtedly is the case. They are piling up money there now, and the money is coming out of hoarding. Now that the opportunity has been presented by a bear market to buy cheap stocks there is a strong demand in our financial centers.

Mr. FLINT. What I wanted the Senator to answer is not whether the money was coming out of hoarding, but whether the banks in the South and the Middle West and the Pacific coast States which complained that they could not get their money and said they would not deposit in New York again, did not immediately after this panic was over deposit their money in the New York center.

Mr. OWEN. I am not aware what the statistics would show with regard to the redeposits since the panic in New York. I do not think there could have been a very great deal of redepositing. Since the southern and western banks could not get their money out when they wanted it they probably have left it where it was. They could not get it when they wanted it, and I guess they have left it there. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLINT. I am directing the attention of the Senator not only to the fact that they left it there, but that immediately after the panic they deposited more at the very place from which they could not get it during the panic.

Mr. OWEN. I will answer the Senator by saying that the substitute I propose requires them to keep it at home.

Mr. FLINT. That is the very question I wanted the Senator to answer, whether he had studied that question, and whether he did not think it was necessary to have some legislation which would compel the banks to keep their money nearer home or in their vaults?

Mr. OWEN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not know, as I believe every other Senator in this Chamber knows, that banks in the South and banks in the West send their money to New York for the purpose of receiving interest on their daily balances, and also because the money can be used better in New York than if it was left in their own vaults at home. A draft upon New York is good anywhere in this country.

Mr. OWEN. Except in panics.

Mr. SMOOT. It is for that reason that the money was there. Continuing along the line of the remark of the Senator from California, I will state that the deposits in New York by the banks of the West and also the South are greater to-day than they were at the time of the panic, and those banks are sending the money to New York because they have confidence in the New York banks and they receive interest upon those deposits on their daily balances. The New York banks should not be charged with this. The bankers in the West and in the South want their money deposited in New York.

Mr. OWEN. I have no special concern at this time with what the bankers want. I think it is a matter of small concern what the bankers want, or where they send their money for interest. They do send their money to New York for interest and they do send it there under the invitation of our notional-bank act, which requires the reserves to be kept in large measure in these so-called central reserve cities, a word that ought to be struck out of our statute, in my opinion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I fully agree with the Senator from Oklahoma in that regard. I believe with all my heart that our reserves ought to be kept largely in the banks at home, and I offered an amendment here the other day for that very purpose, requiring them to be kept there.

Mr. OWEN. I agree.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the New York banks to be found fault with when they should not be, and when the business men of this country themselves have brought about the conditions complained of.

Mr. OWEN. I am not registering any complaint against the New York banks. I am discussing a principle of finance and of law on the floor of the Senate. I have made no complaint against the New York banks. I am obliged to refer to the New York banks in discussing this matter because they are the central reserve agents practically to whom flow the reserves of this nation, and when they use those reserves for speculative loans they use them to the injury of my State and of my section and of my country—the United States.

I have provided a carefully drawn plan in the substitute which I propose, and in my remarks I submit a careful table showing how the plan will work out which I have suggested with regard to these reserves, and I commend it to the attention of the Senator, because I am sure he will agree with me. I am sure that our objects are the same, our purposes are the same, and we ought to be careful not to be drawn in conflict over words nor over the mere form of this proposed law. I have no attachment to form. It is substance that I want. I want these reserves kept where they belong, so that when our cotton crop needs to be moved it shall move, and so that our factories shall be employed and give the means of livelihood to the men and women of my State; so that our people shall not be denied their daily bread as the result of the thoughtless speculation of anybody. I have no feeling of hostility even to the gambler, but when we discuss principles of law we have a right to refer to those conditions which are before our eyes.

I call attention to the fact that this bill refuses any relief to the State banks and to the trust companies and to the savings banks, although they occupy and control two-thirds of the banking field in the United States. What is the reason for that? Look at the Knickerbocker Trust Company with its sixty-seven millions of deposits. There was no relief possible to that company, and yet the run on that company helped to precipitate the panic which locked up the currency of our great Republic from the Atlantic to the Pacific in an incredibly short time, within twenty-four hours.

This committee bill is defective in these particulars, and as it is seriously defective in these particulars, I insist upon it that it shall be amended so as to meet the conditions of this country. It is further defective in the following particular:

UNITED STATES BONDS DENIED THE PRIVILEGE GIVEN RAILROAD BONDS.

Fifth. In the committee bill United States bonds are not permitted to be used as a basis for emergency currency notes, while this privilege is given to railroad bonds, and language is used throughout this measure by which to make effective this distinction in favor of railroad bonds against United States bonds. Railroad bonds should not have this public function, and United States bonds should have it.

Sixth. The committee bill to prevent panic removes every limitation on the contraction of $600,000,000 of our normal national-bank currency, when some reasonable limit is necessary, unless by inviting unlimited contraction of this currency we wish to prolong low prices of commodities and prevent a prompt reaction from the effects of the present panic.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think if a bank had $100,000 of United States bonds it would not take out $100,000 in circulation at a half of 1 per cent tax instead of taking out $90,000 and paying 6 per cent tax?

Mr. OWEN. I will answer that question. If I understand this bill as drawn by the committee, while, of course, any bank may use United States bonds for normal currency, yet nearly all of our banks have their normal currency, particularly the small banks—our western banks. They have in large measure, many of them, up to the face of their capital, and the emergency notes possible under the committee bill are only as to the surplus. Take a bank with $100,000 capital, for instance. Its circulation is $100,000 of normal notes secured by United States bonds at one-half of 1 per cent tax. And this bill denies such a bank the right to use United States bonds for emergency currency and invites the use of railroad bonds instead.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator has noticed the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which shows that they only have 67 per cent of the circulation they are entitled to.

Mr. OWEN. The New York banks, the eastern banks, and the banks in the big cities are the ones which are deficient. The little banks in the country have very nearly their quota.

Mr. ALDRICH. The average is about the same throughout the country.

Mr. OWEN. Whether it is or not is entirely immaterial. The point I call attention to is that a national bank which has $100,000 of capital, with $100,000 of normal notes issued against United States bonds, is confined by this bill to the $20,000 of surplus, if it has $20,000 of surplus, and on that $20,000 of surplus it may issue emergency notes, and those emergency notes so issued shall not be issued against United States bonds, but may be against railroad bonds. Such a bank can not use United States bonds for emergency currency and can use railroad bonds for such purpose. Am I right?

Mr. ALDRICH. The number of banks in the United States that have the total amount of their circulation outstanding are a negligible quantity. I would not undertake to say for the moment how many there are, but I think less than 100 in the whole United States.

Mr. OWEN. You have not answered the question.

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly, if they had the full amount of their circulation outstanding they could not take out any further amount under this bill, except for the amount of the surplus.

Mr. OWEN. Why does the Senator from Rhode Island evade my question? Why does he refuse to them the use of United States bonds as to the surplus when he permits railroad bonds?

Mr. ALDRICH. Because, as I say, the number of banks which have the total amount of their circulation outstanding is so small that it is not necessary to make an exception, in my judgment.

Mr. OWEN. It is a very remarkable exception. It is an exception that I do not approve. A United States bond ought not to be given second place to a railroad bond for any purpose whatever, much less in a statute drawn in the Senate of the United States. In this case, when I ask the Senator whether or not the United States bonds can be used in that instance for emergency notes against that surplus, the Senator says, no, that the United States bonds can not be so used, and I ask him why?

Mr. ALDRICH. I tried to answer.

Mr. OWEN. The effort of the Senator from Rhode Island to answer was a failure. The answer is insufficient. His suggestion that United States bonds can be used for normal circulation is no reply to the question why United States bonds can not be used for emergency circulation when railroad bonds are given that preferential distinction.

Seventh. The committee bill to prevent panic makes no provision for forbidding national banks tying up their resources in speculative loans, which was notoriously one of the important factors in the recent panic.

Eighth. The committee bill to prevent panic makes no provision to prevent improper loans by active bank officers to themselves, which practice proved one of the well-known recent contributing causes that precipitated panic in New York. Witness, the Morse banks and allied institutions.

Ninth. The committee bill to prevent panic is defective because it does not make a proper provision for the maintenance of actual cash reserves in the manner which our present knowledge justifies and requires. It leaves the present fictitious reserves uncorrected.

Tenth. The rate of interest of 6 per cent is hardly high enough to insure and compel prompt retirement. (Six per cent bonds could be used without loss and inflate the currency 75 per cent of their value without cost and with profit in some parts of the country.) The tax on emergency currency should be progressive and high enough to enforce its prompt contraction.

Eleventh. Above all, Mr. President, the committee bill to prevent panic is most seriously defective because it provides no plan of insurance to the depositor of the national banks when the lack of such assurance permits the fear of the depositors to be excited and thus engenders national panic.

In discussing these objections, Mr. President, I shall do so with the greatest brevity consistent with clearness.

PROPOSED ISSUE SHOULD NOT BE LIMITED IN AMOUNT.

First. The first objection, Mr. President, which I make to the committee bill is the limitation of the proposed remedy to $500,000,000, when the chairman of the Committee on Finance has himself submitted figures showing that $467,000,000 of public money, clearing-house certificates, checks intended to be used for currency, and compulsory additional bank-note circulation and forced gold importations were required in the effort to control in any substantial degree the last panic.

Mr. President, the gross estimate of these issues by the chairman is too small. There were a great number of devices used of which there is no record, and all of these remedies combined really failed to prevent the United States having the most disastrous panic in its history.

A greater volume than $500,000,000 was required in 1907 to control this panic.

We are now proposing a remedy which shall take the place of clearing-house certificates, of private checks, of enforced enlargement of normal national-bank note circulation, and of forced gold importation, and when we do provide this remedy we ought not only to make it large enough, as shown by the volume demonstrated to have been necessary in 1907, but we should remember that in another twenty years our banking capital, if it continues with the same average growth in the future which it has in the past, will be far in excess of twice what it is now, and the proportionate demand for a remedy of this character may on some day be more than twice what it was in 1907. We, therefore, should put no limit upon this remedy, for the substantial reason that it violates sound reason and our immediate experience to limit the remedy. The remedy itself involves the Government in no responsibility and really provides a substantial profit to the Government, just in degree as it may be utilized. Why should we limit our water supply for extinguishing a national financial conflagration when the water not only costs us nothing, but will be profitable to the public purse?

Second. The second objection I make to the bill is that it provides that these emergency notes shall be issued under the form and pretense of being national-bank notes, when by sections 6 and 7 of the committee bill they are unquestionably United States notes, payable in gold or its equivalent, at the Treasury. The plan of the committee would require 6,600 different plates to be used by the Bureau of Printing and Engraving for the printing of these notes, and we should go through the absurdity of calling these notes national-bank notes, when, in point of fact, they are really United States notes, payable by the United States in gold, as they ought to be, and are issued by the United States upon the security of first-class bonds as collateral, 10 per cent in excess of the value of such notes, and upon the further security of being a first lien on the assets of the bank to which they have been loaned by the Treasury of the United States.

The issue of these Treasury notes in this form is objectionable, first, for the reason that the note which pretends to be a national-bank note is really a United States note while it simulates the form of a national-bank note.

I do not like the pretense, and if these emergency notes are made "circulating notes of national banking associations," so as to justify section 7 in the sweeping provision that all "circulating notes of national banking associations" shall be redeemed in "lawful money" instead of exchangeable in United States notes as provided (sec. 3, act June 20, 1874), I think the plan is unnecessary.

I should favor section 7, without regard to the emergency notes, because it is of the greatest importance that every dollar which is used in our country should have the same purchasing power in the market and should be the equivalent of our national standard, the gold dollar.

But I very seriously object to the issue of these notes under a pretended form of being national-bank notes, when, in point of fact, they are not national-bank notes, but are United States notes.

Mr. President, I object to section 6 of the committee bill, which amends section 5172, for the reason that the issue of over six thousand different forms of so-called national-bank notes (really United States notes, redeemable in gold) does not depend upon the solvency or the insolvency of the bank of issue, but depends upon abundant collateral required by law to be deposited with the Treasury of the United States.

This cumbersome, irksome, awkward, unreasonable method would require 6,600 varieties of engraved plates, expensive to make, to keep, and to use.

It would require accounts to be kept with 6,600 banks as to their emergency circulation outstanding. It would require many extra employees and cause large unnecessary expense.

If the emergency money consisted simply of the United States notes, but one form of plate would be required and confusion and expense would be avoided. The administration would be comparatively simple and economical.

Mr. President, the reasoning of the chairman of the Committee on Finance is entirely insufficient to justify any such cumbersome method. His reasoning is as follows:

> The majority of the committee were of the opinion that further issue of United States notes at this time would establish a dangerous precedent, and that the approval of their issue, even for temporary and limited purposes, would lead ultimately to a public demand for a continual enlargement of the issue whenever a reasonable pretext could be found.

In other words, Mr. President, the only justification for this cumbersome and unreasonable method is the fear that this emergency currency, if issued as United States notes, although the law be so drawn that such emergency notes can never become a part of our permanent circulation, nevertheless might "lead ultimately to a popular demand for a continual enlargement of the issue."

I confess, Mr. President, that I see no reason whatever to fear the occasional use, once in ten years, of this emergency currency. It never would be used as a matter of fact. I agree with the argument of the chairman of the Committee on Finance in that respect, that these emergency measures hardly ever will be used at all, because when you have the remedy provided and safety assured the danger would not occur, and there would be no substantial use for any of these notes; but if they were used once in ten years, in case of some threatened financial disaster, that would certainly not lead to any popular demand for the enlargement of the issue, provided the emergency issue arranged in the first case is found large enough when put to future test.

The intention should be to make it abundant enough in the first case, and there can then be no excuse whatever to make it more abundant. If we do make it abundant enough, then no enlargement is desirable by anybody.

If this were an addition to our normal circulation, there might be force in the suggestion, but it is not an addition to our ordinary normal circulation and will probably never be needed hereafter at all, for the reason that the existence of the remedy will remove the fear of the people and make its actual future use entirely unnecessary.

And there will be hundreds of these banks whose emergency notes are printed and put in the subtreasury that will be out of business before an emergency will ever arise again in this country. I greatly hope that we shall not have in this century another panic.

I believe that the sovereign right of issuing money belongs exclusively to the United States.

I regard the present national-bank note not as a national-bank note, but as a United States note issued through one of its agencies. The United States is responsible for the national-bank note on the honor of its own bond, and, in my judgment, it would be well to retire these national-bank notes and issue in lieu thereof Treasury notes, payable in gold, at the option of the holder. This is what the committee bill does in fact, because it makes these notes of emergency, as well as the national-bank notes now outstanding, payable "in lawful money" on demand to the holder, which means legal tender, which means gold or its substantial equivalent.

I call attention to section 7 of the committee bill, which makes all of these outstanding notes practically redeemable in gold. So my suggestion has no further reach than that which is contained in the committee measure.

Since they are to be made payable in gold by this committee measure, why should not the United States substitute for all these national-bank notes, now outstanding Treasury notes, payable in "lawful money," as provided by section 7 of the committee bill?

It will not do to say that the country could not conveniently absorb so large a volume of Treasury notes. It has already absorbed precisely the same volume of national-bank notes without difficulty and which have not heretofore been redeemable in "United States notes," but are made by the committee bill redeemable in "lawful" money, which means redeemable in money having a legal-tender quality—that is, in gold coin, in standard silver dollars, subsidiary silver, minor coins, or in United States notes and Treasury notes of 1890.

I believe that every dollar of the United States should be legal tender, especially the gold and silver certificates, and that there should be no evasion of this principle. The United States has the power and credit to make every dollar used as currency the equivalent of the gold dollar which we have made our national standard.

We have in the United States Treasury $150,000,000 gold as a reserve fund, but we have in addition to that over one thousand millions of gold and silver (on bullion basis), against which there are outstanding gold and silver certificates.

Mr. President, I think that this reserve fund of one hundred and fifty millions should by statute be added to by the gradual retirement of the gold certificates, issuing Treasury notes in lieu of such gold certificates when they come into the Treasury, and adding the gold thus released to the reserve fund in the division of redemption.

The effect of the present gold coin in the Treasury, with the gold certificates outstanding, is to provide an enormous fund of gold, amounting to $815,000,000, which is available for the use of those who wish to have gold coin.

This demand could be easily supplied through United States notes payable in gold, and instead of $815,000,000 gold certificates there would be $815,000,000 United States notes secured by an additional reserve fund of $815,000,000 of gold coin. We should then have about one thousand million of gold with which to redeem a smaller amount of Treasury notes, and this great fund of gold would go far to impress the nations of the world with the financial strength and power of this Government. It would then be an asset of our Treasury. It is now a liability.

Of course the Treasury notes outstanding would be a liability also; so that after all it comes merely to a question of form. In the present form of our gold notes, they serve a useful purpose and practically constitute a gold buffer between our redemption fund of $150,000,000 and any demand whatever for gold. So the available gold in the Treasury for commerce—the eight hundred and fifteen millions—is available before there is any use whatever in touching our $150,000,000 of gold reserve.

Our national bank notes outstanding would make $600,000,000 of Treasury notes additional, or a total of $1,400,000,000 Treasury notes, every dollar of which is urgently needed for our daily commerce, and which for that reason would not be presented for redemption. Against these notes of $1,400,000,000 we would have in available gold about $1,000,000,000 in coin and bullion, or 70 per cent gold reserve, nearly double the usual reserve of the Bank of England. We would save $12,000,000 a year in interest on the bonds retired.

Mr. President, I am not one of those who have the slightest fear of the people of the United States or of their conservatism. I have no fear that they will ever make the gross error of issuing any promise to pay, whether in the form of a Treasury note or of a bond, which they will not be abundantly able to pay according to the strictest letter of the contract.

I do not agree with the opinion that the so-called "national-bank note," supposed to be issued by the national banks, is in fact any grant of the sovereign power of issuing money to the national banks. The actual issue of these notes is in every instance made by the United States, and controlled by the United States in the minutest particulars.

The United States in this national-bank note issue merely uses the national bank in whose name the note is issued as a medium for the issuance of the note.

If these national-bank notes were immediately withdrawn and United States notes issued in lieu thereof, it would save the United States and the people of the United States the amount of $9,000,000 annually now paid in net interest on the bonds held in the vaults of the Treasury for the safety of these pretended national-bank notes. The whole plan of issuing these national-bank notes which are now in our permanent circulation appears to me merely a device for giving to the 6,000 national banks a profit measured precisely by the interest on the $600,000,000 2 per cent bonds less the one-half of 1 per cent tax.

It might be said that this quality of being used for the issuance of money raises the value of these bonds, but if the bonds were out of existence there would be no occasion for raising their value.

The operation of this method of issuing national-bank notes against United States bonds seems to me absurd. For example, Mr. President, when the financial bill passed in 1900 if I had been in the national banking business, and had had a capital of $1,000,000 I could have converted my capital into national-bank notes and thereafter I would have received from the Treasury of the United States 1½ per cent net on $1,000,000 for having loaned my valuable money to the Treasury and issuing a similar amount of currency in my name of the same value. This means a net bonus of $15,000 per annum for $1,000,000 of inflation. This system means $9,000,000 a year bonus for $600,000,000 of inflation. This 2 per cent in the instance cited would thus make me an income of $20,000 a year, less a tax of $5,000, which the people of the United States are compelled to pay without any consideration.

Who pays the bill, Mr. President? It is very largely the farmer and producer whose lack of intelligence appears to be relied upon never to discover it nor to complain; it is the producing masses who pay this tax of nine millions a year and this tax is collected from them or from the proceeds of their labor in whatever concrete form it may present itself. I do not think this good legislation. I do not think it a necessity and I do not believe in taxing those who are weak and ignorant for the benefit and privilege of those who are rich and powerful.

I certainly do not believe we should enlarge the issue of national-bank notes, so called, or that the urgent necessity of emergency currency and relief from panic should be used as a pretext for enlarging such so-called "national-bank currency."

DENYING STATE BANKS AND TRUST COMPANIES EMERGENCY NOTES AND RESTRICTING NATIONAL BANKS SEVERELY LIMITS THE VALUE OF THE PROPOSED REMEDY.

Third. As to the third objection which I submit to the committee bill, the various limitations which it makes by restricting the classes of banks, and the extent to which banks are permitted to obtain these emergency notes, I wish to call attention to the fact that these emergency notes are better protected than our normal national-bank currency, which the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance declared to be as good as gold.

(a) Mr. President, why should a national bank be denied its right of protection against panic merely because it has not 50 per cent of its own notes outstanding? Does it strengthen a bank to have a larger measure of notes outstanding than if it had a smaller liability of this character? Evidently not.

Why should a national bank, furnishing the proper collateral, be limited in the amount of emergency notes it is permitted to receive in time of panic? Much less should it be penalized for its conservatism, and punished because it has not issued 50 per cent of its capital in its own notes.

(b) Why should a national bank, which has not 20 per cent surplus, be denied this right of protection against panic, merely for this reason, when such a bank is able to furnish first-class collateral, 10 per cent in excess of the relief proposed?

Why should it be denied emergency notes essential to its welfare when the relief puts the Government in no danger whatever, and is serviceable to the Government itself to the extent of an interest charge of 6 per cent, and when the proposed remedy may be of the highest importance to the welfare and safety of some industrial center, or to the safety and commercial stability of the United States?

There can be no good reason, Mr. President, why this relief should be denied, and there is no good reason for any such limitation.

The committee will not pretend and does not pretend that the value of these emergency notes is due to the credit of the bank to which such notes are advanced, but the safety of such notes depends upon abundant collateral of first-class bonds required by the Government before such notes issue.

The Government makes an actual profit from such emergency notes, and no one will seriously contend that any loss from such issue of emergency notes is possible.

(c) Under the committee measure, if a national bank has a gross amount of notes, normal and emergency, equal to the capital stock and surplus of such national bank, it is then denied any further relief in the way of emergency notes.

For what reason, Mr. President, is this limitation imposed? Such a bank offers abundant collateral in first-class bonds and makes the Government secure; and it offers the Government 6 per cent profit.

The relief sought by such a bank may be of serious importance to some manufacturing center; may be of serious importance to the stability of the commerce and of the success and happiness of the business men of that immediate locality.

Since the Government is safe, and since the Government will make a profit, why should such a bank be denied its most reasonable demand?

Under this proposed limited remedy the great National Bank of Commerce, of Kansas City, run to its death recently by an unfounded suspicion, would be limited in emergency notes obtainable by this bank to $2,000,000 (its surplus), and yet this same bank had on hand nearly $7,000,000 of bonds, $14,000,000 of cash, which includes accounts with other banks, of course, and deposits of $35,000,000. Their loans and discounts were only about 50 per cent of their deposits, and yet they were driven to ruin by the baseless rumor of a circular letter questioning their solvency.

This magnificent institution paid out $18,000,000 before closing its doors against a panic and a run that was absolutely senseless and idiotic.

The institution, I am thoroughly satisfied, is solvent to-day, and no question could ever have justly arisen as to its conservative management, except from the envy and malice of enemies.

And yet under this bill this institution, with assets of $40,000,000, would not be allowed emergency notes on good bonds for over $2,000,000, even if their necessities compelled them to have $17,000,000 more to pay their depositors in full.

If it had been known that the National Bank of Commerce could have obtained emergency notes on good bonds the depositors would never have made the run, because the only reason the depositor has for drawing his money out is the fear that he can not get money in case of his own necessity.

The bank of which I had the honor to be president ten years withdrew from the National Bank of Commerce over $150,000 in a few days because of this terrible rumor, which was spread broadcast by a circular letter. We knew it meant the ruin of that bank and that we were not strong enough to sustain them against the hurricane of panic.

I confess I was ashamed of the transfer, and yet if the deposit referred to had remained it would have made no difference in the result.

But, Mr. President, an opportunity is afforded me now to insist upon a remedy broad enough to protect a like institution in the future against the terrible danger of panic, and I deem it a serious duty to insist upon the fullest measure of protection, because the welfare of the banks, the stability of our national commerce, depends upon it. The harm done to the Southwest by the closing of the doors of the National Bank of Commerce can not be measured by the few millions involved in the closing of this bank. The confidence of the people for the future in the stability of our institutions has been tremendously impaired by this wreckage of what was regarded the most conservatively managed bank in the Southwest. It avails nothing to say that the wreckage of this bank was cunningly contrived by enemies who wanted the deposits of this institution. The terrible fact is, our people are thus taught to distrust the strongest, and distrust and suspicion are deadly enemies to our growth and development. This distrust may endanger, and does endanger, any bank and any enterprise.

It is a deep disgrace and dishonor to this Government that such a condition of peril should exist under our statutes, and I shall not be a party, Mr. President, to its continuance.

Indeed, I wipe my hands of any responsibility, because eight years ago I caused an adequate remedy to be offered to the chairman of the Committee on Finance and to this honorable body, and it passed unnoticed. And now that I repeat the suggestion, as a Member on this floor, I pray the interest, the attention, and a proper action on the part of the Senate of the United States.

(d) Mr. President, the committee bill puts a further limitation upon the proposed relief. It proposes that the emergency notes shall be issued only proportionately to certain States of the Union. If California were in great need and the balance of the country were in no need whatever, the relief afforded California would be equivalent to its proportionate part, although the balance of the country was not in any immediate need, or about one-fortieth part of five hundred millions, approximately, or about twelve millions to meet another financial earthquake.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I will ask the Senator this question. If the financial troubles were purely local, as the Senator mentions, referring to my own State, would there be any difficulty in his opinion in banks in the State of California obtaining all the money they desired from other States of the Union, from other financial centers?

Mr. OWEN. I think not.

Mr. FLINT. Then why is there any trouble about limiting the amount to my State or any other State to the sum of $12,000,000 on the proposition that a local condition exists, as far as the financial situation is concerned?

Mr. OWEN. I think it ought not to be limited.

Mr. FLINT. I will ask the Senator what objection there is to limiting it when it is a local proposition. The banks can draw money from other centers at a less rate of interest than the 6 per cent required under this bill.

Mr. OWEN. You are not providing merely for local, but for general panic. If you put a limitation upon the issue you weaken your opportunities when you are making provision against a general panic. You are making provision against such a situation as we had in 1907, when, on October 26, the panic swept from one end of the country to the other suddenly, and in making provision it should be made as broad as possible with no limitation to the sum of $500,000,000.

Mr. FLINT. As a panic sweeps across the country, under this bill, as I understand it, starting with California, in each locality they would be issuing their money until under the bill the full $500,000,000 had been issued.

Mr. OWEN. Well, I will answer that by stating just what has occurred recently. Here was the case. If you will observe, the national banks and all other banks issued clearing-house certificates, issued cashiers' checks, and issued these various devices to the amount of hundreds of millions for their own relief. These various banks resorted to that practice which we are told by the chairman of the Committee on Finance will not be endured again; that the country will not stand it another time—although the country will, all right. The country will stand it and will thank God that the banks violate the laws of this country, as we all have done heretofore. When the New York banks, the Boston banks, and the Philadelphia banks issued clearing-house certificates, we all knew it was a violation of the law, and we thank the good Lord that they had the nerve to violate the laws as they were written; and I, for one, commend them for it, as I would commend the suspension of habeas corpus under sufficient public danger or a vigilance committee when common sense requires it.

But in such a panic as this last, if there were to be no other relief than this measure proposes, New York would be confined to a hundred million dollars, a sum entirely insufficient to control a panic there. When a panic starts in New York it ends in San Francisco, and the time to stop it is when it starts. It is precisely like a fire which starts in a block of buildings. When the fire is starting is the time to put it out and to use a sufficient amount of water then and there to extinguish the conflagration, which would never be extinguished by applying a little water at different places along the line.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. The proposition as stated by the Senator from Oklahoma I would answer by saying that, if the New York banks had been able to issue a hundred million dollars when the panic started, so far as the New York situation is concerned it would have been settled immediately. The next day or the day after it followed in Pittsburg, and if Pittsburg could have issued its proportion of money as provided in this bill it would have stopped that panic in Pittsburg. Then it would have crossed, as it did, to Chicago, and it would have stopped it there. Next it would have stopped the panic in Kansas City, and the situation would not have been that a great bank in Kansas City would have been closed for the reason that at the time the panic had reached Kansas City it would not only have had the aid of the $2,000,000, but those other cities would then have been able to respond and to send money to Kansas City to save that bank from closing its doors, which should not have been permitted. Then the panic would have been continued from the eastern end of the country until it reached my own State, as the Senator has said; and by that time this sum of $500,000,000 would have been issued. As stated by the Senator in the commencement of his remarks, the fact that the people of the country would know that the emergency had been met in each one of those cities, the panic never would have spread across the country, but it would have stopped after it reached one or two cities.

Mr. OWEN. I am in entire sympathy with the spirit of the argument of the Senator from California, and I will agree with him that California, Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, Missouri, and the other States of the Union each ought to have what they require; but I differ from him in the idea that New York ought to be denied if she requires more than this bill provides. I think New York ought to have all that she wants and that nobody ought to be denied.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Oklahoma permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the Senator to make a vicious, fierce, and justifiable attack upon stock gambling in New York. Am I correct?

Mr. OWEN. I think stock gambling should be controlled.

Mr. TILLMAN. Agreeing with the Senator's view in that, and in urging anybody and everybody who can do so to suggest a remedy that will be adequate, I want to ask the Senator this question: If his policy should be followed, of allowing New York to have all the currency she sees fit at any time she may say she needs it, and New York inflates the currency two or three or five hundred millions of dollars, thereby putting prices up, so that the stock gamblers will have an opportunity to unload on the lambs or innocent purchasers, and New York turns around in one night and contracts the currency by five hundred millions, what happens then? Do not all those poor wretches go to the devil? [Laughter.] In other words, the Senator is arguing against his own contention. In one part of his speech he argues admirably from my point of view, and I agree with him entirely, and then he turns around, and in another place in his remarks he seems to have lost sight of his previous argument.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OWEN. After I shall reply to the Senator from South Carolina I will yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. FLINT. Very well.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] asked me a question and I wish to reply to it. In the measure which I have proposed the national banks, which carry the reserves of the country in New York, are forbidden to lend that money for the making of speculative loans in the stock exchange. In the bill which I introduced to-day as an independent measure the quotations of the stock exchanges, until they shall have been approved and placed under the supervision of proper safeguards by the Department of Commerce and Labor, are not to be admitted to the mails.

Mr. TILLMAN. What about the telegraph?

Mr. OWEN. That is another question. We can not manage all the earth at once. If the quotations are under proper control before entering the mail, and gambling prevented, the telegraph is not important.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know; but the stock market quotations go by telegraph and not by mail. Most of the speculation is done by telegraph.

Mr. OWEN. The chief mischief is through the public press sent by mail, but, nevertheless, for full measure, I will accept the Senator's amendment. But what I want to say is, that in this proposed substitute the New York Stock Exchange can not avail itself of the reserves of this country hereafter, as it has done in the past, provided that the Senate and House of Representatives give approval to this substitute I propose, which prevents the deposits of the banks being used for gambling purposes.

Mr. TILLMAN. But I was calling attention to the fact that the Senator is allowing the New York banks to issue $500,000,000 in emergency currency; that it would not be emergency at all, but it would be simply giving those buccaneers and pirates over there the opportunity to inflate the currency ad libitum, then suddenly collapse or contract it and run prices up or down to suit their speculative purposes.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will only permit me to answer, I will be glad to do so.

Having taken these precautionary steps to prevent the national banks from using their depositors' money for the making of these speculative loans, I call your attention to the fact that the New York Stock Exchange can not, for their own purposes, expand the currency through the banks for such uses. That is a complete answer to the suggestion which has been made by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then we will have to take the whole bottle of your remedy at once.

Mr. OWEN. Yes. And I want you to do it. That is what I am on this floor for.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if the national banks of New York are prevented from making loans upon stocks which are quoted upon the stock board in New York, where are they going to loan their money, and how are they going to loan it in order to make interest upon it?

Mr. OWEN. I would suggest that they lend it to those industries of this country which are now paralyzed and dead.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that before the panic began—and I fully agree with the Senator as to why it was brought on—any industry in the United States that wanted money very easily got all it needed, and not only did the banks loan money for such industries, but they made loans and took as security for those loans those stocks to which the Senator now objects. I have wondered, so long as money is to be placed in New York, to whom the banks would make loans if the law should prevent them from taking stocks as securities.

Mr. OWEN. I will suggest that they might use such funds for the purpose of promoting commerce, and not for promoting gambling.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe the Senator has had some experience in the banking business, and I suppose he has passed on a good many loans—that is evidently so from his remarks here to-day—and I believe he will say that, so far as loans are concerned, if these stocks were put up as collateral security for such loans they would be just as safe loans as a bank could possibly make. Does not the Senator think so?

Mr. OWEN. I will answer the Senator from Utah by saying that undoubtedly a good stock is good collateral, and it is an advisable collateral for these loans where they are legitimately made. The prohibition which I call attention to is a prohibition of loans for speculative purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Oklahoma so far as speculation is concerned.

Mr. OWEN. Then you agree with me all the way through, because that is the only contention I make.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether he simply limits his prohibition to speculation in the stock market of Wall street, and does not limit it throughout the country; to speculation in town lots and cattle, as such speculation goes on in the western States? There is just as much speculation in stock, cattle, and town lots carried on by means of loans made by the banks as there is in the city of New York on loans made there on stocks and bonds.

Mr. OWEN. So far as this bill is concerned, I would not propose to control the gambling at a faro table, or roulette or any ordinary gambling device, which amuses and robs men; but when this gambling is of a nature to cause a panic, to paralyze the commerce of this country and destroy our business stability, so that an honest, hard-working man is unable to make his livelihood, it is high time to draw the line; and it is for that purpose, and that purpose alone, that I have offered my substitute. It is not on account of banks or bankers. I am not considering primarily the banker or the depositor; I am considering the men who earn their daily bread for themselves, their wives, and their children by the sweat of their faces, and who now walk our streets by countless thousands, having been driven out of employment as the result of this gambling on Wall street.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to ask the Senator this question in order to understand his position. Is it the Senator's idea when a customer comes to a bank to borrow money that the bank should decline to lend it unless the man makes affidavit that he is not going to use it for speculative purposes?

Mr. OWEN. I have been long in the banking business, and I will answer the Senator.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is what I asked the question for.

Mr. OWEN. I will answer the Senator's question. I say that any banker who is a prudent banker ought to know the business of his borrower. He ought to know where that money is going. He ought to know that the money will be returned. If he knows that that money is going to be used in a culpable business, in a dangerous transaction, in a business that is harmful to the country, it is his bounden duty, as a patriotic citizen in the first place and as a good banker in the second place, to say to the borrower: "I want to know where you are going to use this money?" I will say more, that if this bill is amended, as I think it ought to be, it will become the legal duty of the banker to so inquire.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, then, the Senator's position is, that in every instance the banker should know before he lends the money passed over his counter to the customer what that customer is going to do with the money?

Mr. OWEN. He should know that it is not going to be used in the gambling business.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is it the Senator's position that the banker should know before the money passes over the counter to the customer that that customer is going to use it for some purpose which the banker thinks is a legitimate business?

Mr. OWEN. The question the Senator asks ingeniously embraces within its scope a multitude of immaterial propositions. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must admonish the occupants of the galleries that applause is not allowed under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HOPKINS. A suggestion of that kind by the Senator from Oklahoma does not answer my question at all. The proposition I make is a clear one. The Senator has been arguing that this money must be used for legitimate purposes. In order to make this perfectly clear to the Senate, I asked my question so that we might know, and the Senator can say whether or not that is his purpose and understanding.

Mr. OWEN. I have already answered the Senator that his question embraces a number of immaterial matters, because he asked in fact whether the banker must know precisely what is going to be done with the money, notwithstanding the fact that under this bill, if it becomes a law, as I propose, the banker would be required to know in fact that the money is not going into this form of gambling. The only question he would be concerned with under the proposed statute would be whether or not this money was going to be used in violation of a statute of the United States. That is the question that will be before him. But when the Senator asks the question whether the banker must know precisely what is going to be done with the money which he lends, how much the borrower is going to spend for groceries, and how much for drink, he puts into his question immaterial matters.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, Mr. President, my question does not comprehend that at all. The question I put to the Senator is an entirely different proposition. Suppose the customer who goes to your bank desires to buy railroad stock through the stock exchange in New York, would you, under your arrangement, decline to allow a loan if the party brought good security?

Mr. OWEN. Not at all if the customer is going to buy the stock for investment. If he is buying it for the purpose of gambling, I would.

Mr. HOPKINS. Suppose he was buying that stock and paying for it for the purpose of a rise in the market, would you then refuse the loan?

Mr. OWEN. Undoubtedly, when he borrows money for his gamble on "a rise in the market."

Mr. HOPKINS. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. OWEN. Well, the Senator knows. [Laughter.] That is the very thing that the banker ought to be forbidden to do. This thing of making the market go up and making the market go down is the means by which this country is being robbed continually. Take the stock market as it is now and as it has been for the last seven years—and I will submit a table in the course of my remarks showing the fluctuations in these stocks. Take such a stock as Amalgamated Copper, which was at 130 at one time and down to 33 at another time, used for the purpose of being a sponge, which has its filaments extending out through the country to every little hamlet, and coming to——

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no, Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will wait a moment until I get through——

Mr. HOPKINS. That does not touch the subject at all.

Mr. OWEN. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. HOPKINS. That does not touch the subject——

Mr. OWEN. I decline to be interrupted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma declines to yield.

Mr. OWEN. It is just like a huge sponge, with its filaments extending along the telegraph wires, going to every little village, connecting with every little bucket shop, and persuading the immature youth of the country, unlearned people, and women to go in and buy a little stock on the proposed rise, inducing them to gamble away their property, and when the market has gone up to a high price it is then put down, down, down until they are frightened out of their foolish wits, and those more learned, richer, and more skillful and unscrupulous than they accumulate and cash in their property, not to the extent of a few hundred dollars, as on a horse race, but to many hundreds of millions, and, I believe, to the extent of thousands of millions.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator from Oklahoma has created a bogeyman that has no relation whatever to my question. My proposition was as to whether he would refuse to make a loan to a party that desired on the stock exchange to buy stock and hold it, or to buy Government bonds or municipal bonds or any other kind of bonds. That is what I wanted to know. The Senator runs off on another proposition that nobody defends.

Mr. OWEN. I am glad that nobody defends it; but I want to say to the Senator from Illinois that there is a wonderful number of people who practice it.

Mr. HOPKINS. They may in Oklahoma, but it is not so in my section of the country.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator's observation is more humorous than exact.

If the State of Washington needed immediate relief the limit under this bill would be approximately about four millions; Oregon might possibly obtain two millions; Idaho might possibly obtain one million; Maine and New Hampshire or Vermont or Rhode Island might receive a benefit of two millions, and the forty-six States an average of about $11,000,000 only obtainable through the difficulty of as many hurdles and obstructions.

It is true that, in case States contiguous might not within a certain time demand a similar relief, the relief may be extended to the banks of the applicant State, but the relief against panic in order to be effective ought to be instantaneous, just as the relief offered a burning building should be by the instantaneous application of water; it serves but little purpose to offer water to a building after it is fatally involved.

While the intention of this limitation of a proposed remedy to States is evidently good, its purpose appears to be upon the theory of giving each one of the children a piece of pie of the same relative size. This conception of the equitable distribution of a remedy of this character contains a very serious error, because the principle which should control emergency currency is the same as the principle of applying water to one of a number of burning frame buildings in a block of buildings. The water necessary to put the fire out in the first building should be available instantaneously, without any delay whatever.

If New York needs five hundred millions within twenty-four hours to completely put out the fire of panic, New York ought to have relief to that extent and within the limit of a single business day.

The remedy ought not to be limited to the State, or in the other restrictive ways suggested by the committee measure.

Is there wisdom in restricting the remedy?

Would it be justified, Mr. President, to say that a house on fire should only receive a limited amount of water, even if the danger of its destruction was very great?

Would the owners of the frame buildings in a block think it wise to limit the water to be supplied to put out the first house on fire, in order that they might subsequently, when the conflagration had become enormous, have a like limited supply which would then be ineffectual to suppress the common danger?

Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island, in his remarks on February 10, 1908, described the terrible consequences of financial panic.

And having with great force described the destructive consequences of this financial conflagration from which we are just emerging, the evil effects of which are not yet fully realized, he advises a remedy which he demonstrates by his own remarks to be insufficient in volume.

He paints a picture of the destructive effects of a national conflagration, earnestly recommends water with which to put out the fire and to provide against future destructive fires, and having done so, he recommends as a remedy a limited amount of water, to be used by a limited number of firemen, and by each one with a very small hose, in a limited way, and confines the operations of each to a limited district.

Mr. President, the water should be abundant. Any fireman willing to use it should be permitted to do so, and he should not be limited in water nor in the place where he will render service in helping to extinguish the conflagration which would otherwise easily extend itself.

The committee bill limits the amount to a total of five hundred millions, when far more than five hundred millions were necessary in the panic which has just passed. The committee recommends that even this limited supply should only be advanced as a total to certain national banks, under numerous reactionary restrictions, when all the national banks combined comprise only one-third of the banks of the country.

The committee recommends that even these particular national banks shall be limited still further as individuals and be advanced only a very limited amount of emergency notes.

And even these limitations are further limited so as to confine the remedy to the limited district of the States severally, according to their proportionate banking capital, measured by the national banks within that State. These emergency notes ought to be as broad as possible, available to any and every bank, and available in any quantity necessary, and available in any place which requires it.

Mr. President, I earnestly call the attention of the Committee on Finance to the inexpediency of limiting the amount of notes to be furnished to any national bank.

I respectfully submit that no national bank should be denied any amount of these notes for which they furnish the required collateral, for the obvious reason that the redress from panic ought to be made as abundant as possible consistent with the safety of issue.

And when these notes are secured by bonds of the first quality, far in excess of the value of the notes themselves, and the additional but useless security of being a first lien against the assets of the bank is required, there can be no good reason for withholding the amount of these thoroughly secured notes which the threatened danger of panic may make necessary.

I regret exceedingly to see this bill omit the State banks and the trust companies. These great financial institutions may at some time be sadly in need of this relief. Look at the Knickerbocker Trust Company, with its $67,000,000 of deposits, ruined by a run upon the institution when by a proper conservation its condition might have been relieved and great loss to the people avoided. The Knickerbocker Trust was like a detonating cap, causing the explosion of a train of powder ready to set off.

I think that the committee's bill ought to provide that any bank putting up the proper security might have this relief, not for the sake of the bank, not for the sake of the depositor, but for the sake of our national commerce, for the stability of our country, and for the welfare of those millions of poor human beings who depend upon this Congress for wise laws to protect them in their quiet, simple lives of faithful, willing labor. They can not act for themselves. They leave it to this body to care for them, and, it seems to me, the Senate ought to feel a sense of providence, as a father would for a weak child; that we ought to take care of the poorer and weaker elements of our country, doing it consistently with the principles of good government; dealing justly also with the great financial institutions, and never treating any of them harshly or unjustly in any degree.

I have no hostility to any of our great stock exchanges. They have a sphere of legitimate use, but I disapprove their practices when their practices prove dangerous to this country; and I think that we have a right to put proper restraints upon them so that they shall not abuse the power which they have, because these great national banks and trust companies are the purveyors of credit in our country. They have in their hands the giving and the refusing of credit. I call your attention to the fact that when they freely extend credit, when, for example, they loan $100 a share on Amalgamated Copper stock, copper goes up, and when they refuse to lend on Amalgamated Copper stock, copper goes down. They can bull the market and they can bear the market by their giving or refusing credits. Since they have that power and since they have used it to the damage and ruin of this country it is high time that the Senate should take proper steps to control them in a wrongful exercise of the tremendous power which is vested in their hands.

WHY ARE STATE BANKS, TRUST COMPANIES, AND SAVINGS BANKS DENIED THIS REMEDY AGAINST PANIC WHEN THEY OFFER ABUNDANT SECURITY?

Fourth. But, Mr. President, the State banks and the savings banks and the loan and trust companies and private banks, about 17,000 banks, have an amount of banking capital twice as great as the national banks; their capital stock is nearly twice as great as the national banks, and their individual deposits are more than twice as great, and yet these enormous financial agencies of our country are refused by this bill the relief of emergency circulation.

These great State organizations, with twice the deposits of the national banks and with twice the number of individual depositors, have only one-half of the currency kept by the national banks, and therefore for this reason it is the more important from a standpoint of public exigency that they should have the right of receiving this relief against panic.

It is not for the sake of State banks, trust companies, and savings banks and private banks alone that I wish this done, Mr. President, but it is for the credit and stability of our national commerce, upon which must depend the welfare of every man in the business of manufacturing, mining, agriculture, transportation, or merchandise, and upon which our national credit before the civilized world depends.

The deposits of the State, savings, private, and loan and trust companies for the year 1907 was $8,776,755,207 (Comptroller of the Currency, p. 35), and the cash on hand was only $391,000,000, while the national banks, with individual deposits of $4,319,000,000, had only $721,000,000 in cash, and owed to the State banks and trust companies over seven hundred millions of cash.

I insist, therefore, Mr. President, that the State banks and trust companies and the savings banks, who shall offer the proper collateral, shall also be allowed to receive emergency currency, not for their sake alone but for the sake of the stability of the commerce of the United States. These emergency notes are abundantly secured. They pay a tax which would make their issuance profitable to the Government, and the more limitations you put upon this remedy the more ineffective you make the remedy. Mr. President, there is no sound reason whatever in limiting this relief to certain States, in the proportion that the capital and surplus of national banks of that State bear to the capital and surplus of the national banks of the United States; but this remedy should be applied in the fullest measure necessary to give relief wherever the relief is needed, and since it is always in New York that panics begin, I am not in favor of limiting the proposed relief in the manner indicated.

If New York should need five hundred millions of these emergency notes to prevent panic, to relieve a panic on Wall street, I am in favor of the issue to that extent then and there, for the disease from which New York occasionally suffers is contagious as far as the Pacific coast and vitally affects Oklahoma and every Western State as it does every other State in the Union.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance wisely points out that $467,000,000 in currency, clearing-house certificates, and checks were put in circulation for the relief of the panic, a large part of which was poured out in New York without stopping that crisis, and yet, by this bill he would limit New York to the relief of emergency notes on its proportionate part, as proposed, to less than one hundred millions. There is no wisdom in this limitation. It would be far better to put as few limitations upon the emergency notes as is practicable. If New York had been furnished with abundant currency, Oklahoma would have gotten currency from her New York correspondent without difficulty and without cost. In fact, Oklahoma would have needed little currency except for the panic and excitement in New York, the contagion of which was instantly and injuriously felt.

THE OBJECTIONS MADE TO EMERGENCY CURRENCY BASED ON BONDS WITHOUT FORCE.

Some say that the bonds available will be held by a few banks. The answer to this is that it is not true in the first place, and in the second place, that it is not material who holds the bonds, for if they are available for currency and the currency is needed, the bonds will be found and will be available wherever required.

The emergency plan, however, should provide that each bank should carry a reasonable proportion of these bonds, available for emergency currency.

Others, objecting, say that this plan would be to favor the bondholders. Yes; this is possibly true; but the banks ought to be the bondholders to the extent of their necessities and under their reasonable relation as curators of our commerce. The objection, however, is much like the man complaining, whose health should be in serious danger without a remedy, that the remedy proposed meant compensation to the druggist who kept the remedy available. The objection is idiotic.

RAILROAD BONDS PREFERRED TO UNITED STATES BONDS.

Fifth. I vigorously protest, Mr. President, against the committee bill in so far as it denies to United States bonds the privilege of being used as a basis for emergency notes, while this very important and valuable privilege is given to railroad bonds.

It is well known that the privilege of being used as a basis for currency, redeemable in United States notes, given to the 2 per cent bonds of the United States, has made those bonds worth as high as 10 per cent above par, and this privilege has probably made those bonds easily worth 20 per cent higher than they would be if those bonds were not available for currency.

The very moment that you give this sovereign right to the bonds of the railroad corporations owned by private persons you transfer a public property of the greatest financial value from public hands to private hands.

Mr. President, I regard this proposed legislation as injudicious in the highest degree.

I should almost as readily give my vote for appropriating a given number of dollars out of the public Treasury to private interests without consideration as to give my vote for this transfer of public values to private interests.

Has not this country gone far enough in using the public property for private purposes? Will the enormously rich never be content with the skillful plunder of the people?

And shall we initiate a new method of diverting public values to private persons?

Mr. President, I inclose a list of railroad bonds, many of which come within the scope of this bill, and suggest that this bill, if amended, should read on its face: "A bill appropriating certain sums of unknown value to the following bonds held by private persons to us unknown, but with whom we are on relations of amity."

I call attention to the great fluctuation of these bonds under the influence of the Stock Exchange.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. I trust the Senator will allow me to interrupt him a moment in connection with the question propounded by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] a moment ago, to read from what ex-Secretary Gage has said on this subject. In the hearings before the committee of the House, ex-Secretary Gage used this language:

A borrower came to the bank and wished to make a loan. He could not avail himself of the result of the credit if placed on the bank's book and availed of by his checks, which would be transferable in the field of circulation which limited the bank's business horizon. In such a case circulating notes or currency could be perhaps utilized for the borrower's purpose, and perhaps to the advantage of the bank, and the question always arose, "What do you want to do with the proceeds of this credit?" If the man wanted to borrow and buy securities with the money, if he wanted to borrow and pay a note in the next town, the bank would not issue to him its notes; it would not give him credit upon its books. In short, it would not exchange its credit for his, because it was easily seen that through the instrumentalities which he would use, whether by his checks or by the notes which they would give him, he would attack and deplete by so much the cash reserve which supported and protected the whole line of liability. The notes would attack the reserve situation by going strictly to the redemption agent in New York and there be redeemed. His check would exhaust the reserve by being collected in the next town where he gave his check in payment for his notes.

But if it appeared, as in very many cases it did appear, that the man wanted currency for some of the commercial or industrial uses of life, like the payment of employees, like going up into the "north woods," as we called it then, to pay men for getting timber and doing a logging business, or going into Indiana to buy wheat, or into Wisconsin for that same purpose, or into Ohio for the purchase of wool, and all those miscellaneous purposes which go to make up the products of industry, and start them forward to market, then by the power that the bank had to issue its unissued notes, which might still lie unused, the bank was glad to make that transaction, and the money (bank notes) was available to the man if his credit was good so that the bank was willing to take the risk.

That is the language of ex-Secretary Gage, at one time president of the First National Bank of Chicago, who says that in all these cases they made a point of inquiring what the depositor wanted money for. If he wanted it for legitimate commercial purposes, they would make him the loan; if he wanted it for speculative purposes, they would not.

Mr. OWEN. The law of reserves requires it. The law of reserves permits a bank to buy exchange against products going to market, even when the reserve is down below the point required by law. The statement read by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] answers the objection of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] most perfectly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Not an objection of mine. I was simply inquiring as to the attitude of the Senator from Oklahoma. I was not stating what my position was at all. I was simply calling for information to have him develop still further his position.

Mr. OWEN. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Illinois.

I call attention to the great fluctuations in the price of railroad bonds since this bill was proposed in the Senate. It has been said, in answer to the suggestion which I make, that the railroad bonds ought not to be given this money value as a basis for emergency currency, that it would not make any material difference. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it has made a material difference in the month of January, since the plan of the chairman of the Finance Committee was exploited. I will insert here a table of bonds, with their rise in value during January. I will not stop to read it, but if any Senator cares to see it the table will speak for itself.

Mr. President, since this proposition to use railroad bonds for the basis of issuance of emergency notes has been talked about and advocated it has had the effect of raising the market value of these securities, when all of such increase should attach and belong exclusively to bonds issued by the people of the United States for public purposes.

I inclose a list showing the rise of value of a few of these railroad bonds within the dates indicated.

Mr. President, I feel the greatest respect for and interest in our transportation companies. I desire that they shall receive the most considerate and the fairest treatment at all times, and yet, Mr. President, I think that this Senate has no right to give them, by legislation, values which belong alone to the people of the United States, who have trusted this body with temporary authority.

CONTRACTION OF NORMAL NATIONAL-BANK CURRENCY SHOULD NOT BE MADE UNLIMITED BY THIS COMMITTEE BILL.

Sixth. Mr. President, I think it is unwise to allow the withdrawal of the normal bank currency without any limitation. I think there should be at least some limitation upon the withdrawal of normal national-bank currency, and I should be willing to nine millions per month; but I do not think, Mr. President, it is prudent to provide unlimited contraction by this statute, as it might bring about the same evil consequences which are produced by the hoarding of currency, and which has proved very disastrous in the recent panic.

I do not think, Mr. President, our normal national-bank notes should be withdrawn without limit, as it is better for the country that the currency of the United States should remain as nearly as possible within stable equilibrium.

Let the banks give up their Federal deposits if they have too much currency.

While our country is reacting from the terrible panic inflicted on us by the gamblers of New York, every dollar available should be left in circulation as a stimulus to renewed courage and enterprise.

Contraction means falling prices, and commodities have been falling steadily. Merchants do not buy readily on a falling market. Factories are checked or stopped by a falling demand and a bad market. Contraction will raise the interest rates, but we do not need higher interest. We need lower interest, renewed activities, sustained commodity values, so that idle men and machinery may be got to work again. C. T. Libby well says in regard to contraction: "If that policy is to be again employed, it should be over the mangled corpses of every merchants' association, chamber of commerce, and board of trade in this country."

NATIONAL BANKS SHOULD NOT BE PERMITTED TO USE THEIR DEPOSITS FOR SPECULATIVE LOANS.

Seventh. The committee bill, Mr. President, makes no provision for forbidding national banks from using their depositors' money for speculative loans.

We all know that the New York banks hold in their hands twelve hundred millions of deposits, including the deposits and reserves of the national banks and of the State banks and of the trust companies throughout the Union from California to Maine.

And yet we also know that more than one-half of these deposits put with the New York banks for reserves were tied up and crystallized in loans for the speculative buying and selling of stocks, while one-fourth only is held as a cash reserve, so that the money needed, or, I should rather say, the bankable credit needed, for the transaction of our commerce was made unavailable last fall by the loans for speculation on the stock exchanges of New York.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance advised the Senate on December 18, 1907, that—

> No committee can ascertain * * * "the precise causes of any financial crisis which has taken place in the history of this country."

He also said:

> It is the facts that we want with reference to this crisis—what the operations of the Treasury have been; what the operations of the banks have been, and what other facts there are in existence that bear upon the crisis as it actually took place.
> There may be a dozen reasons why this panic occurred, which may have no bearing upon legislation.

Mr. President, one of the reasons why this panic occurred, which does have bearing upon legislation, was the tying up of the bank credits placed with New York for reserves, was in making loans for the speculative buying or handling of stocks, and they are still tied up in large measure. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to this well-known fact, and invite him now to amend his bill so that the reserves of all of the banks of the United States placed in New York shall no longer be used for gambling purposes, but shall be used only for the legitimate commerce of our people.

The honorable Secretary of War, in speaking at Detroit, Mich., February 13, is reported to have explained the reason of panic and to have said:

> It is due, if students of finance are to be trusted, to the gradual exhaustion of all the free capital held in enterprises which have not been so profitable as it was expected they would be. Now, we must wait, the whole world must wait, until we can earn more free capital.

The only thing, Mr. President, which we need to wait for is to have our available reserves in New York made free capital by withdrawing these loans from speculative purposes and to hereafter confine the use of our national reserves placed with the New York banks to their legitimate commercial purposes and forbid the embarrassment of our national-bank deposits by being employed in the notorious gambling palace called the "New York Stock Exchange."

The banks of our country are in fact our national purveyors of credits. Their depositors place with the banks certain cash and credits, and exchange these cash credits from one individual to another by means of checks and drafts. The banks of the United States keep their reserves in a large measure in the form of credit placed with New York banks, and when the New York banks tie these credits up in speculative loans and loan out these credits for gambling purposes on the stock exchange they divert the credits which ought to be available for commerce and place such credits where they are capable, on the contrary, of doing the most serious harm to the people of the United States. It leads, as all gambling leads, to skillful knavery by which the artful and ingenuous arrange devices through which weaker and less intelligent people are drawn into the game and fleeced of their property. It affords a peculiar field where those, who are enormously rich and powerful already, can, by manipulation, even drag down and absorb fortunes which elsewhere would be themselves regarded as gigantic.

Mr. President, it was the judgment of the moral sentiment of the people of the United States that the Louisiana Lottery should be suppressed. In this well-known game of chance it had at least in its favor reasonable assurance of integrity of management. It did not use marked cards or loaded dice, but the distribution was made according to the element of chance with an assured degree of fairness. In the New York Stock Exchange manipulations, nobody pretends there is any degree of integrity. The most ingenious lies are circulated as the truth for the purpose of "bulling" and "bearing" stock.

Men are invited into contracts and the most artful and crafty manipulations thereafter designed and executed to make their compliance with their contracts impossible, and in that way take from them their property under the forms of law.

Men are induced to invest their property in stocks on a high market and credits extended to them so that they may carry the speculative loan, and then the credit is slowly and gradually put through a series of reductions, not necessarily reducing the loan, but demanding more collateral, and finally when the victim or his idiotic successor has all his wealth upon the table, credit is denied and he is compelled to deliver. The moral sentiment of the people of the United States is against the gambling on the stock exchange and against its similar, but not more criminal imitator, the bucket shop, and I believe, Mr. President, that since the gambling on the stock exchange was undeniably a potent influence in producing panic, it should be suppressed as far as the United States has power, and certainly within the limits of this committee bill the national banks should be forbidden to use the reserves of the people of the United States for the promotion of the speculative buying and selling of stocks on these exchanges.

In New York the banks are used as convenient tools for the most gigantic gambling the world has ever known.

The world's greatest gambling house is the New York Stock Exchange—"an unincorporated, irresponsible institution." (Creelman.)

According to James Creelman's statistics, 286,418,601 shares of stock of par value of $25,000,000,000, besides 665,000 of thousand-dollar bonds, were "sold" in 1906 on the Stock Exchange; and on the Consolidated Exchange 136,000,760 shares of stock, besides 21,569,178 shares of mining stock and 193,884,000 bushels of wheat. This does not include curb sales. Over $30,000,000,000—four times the value of the products of all the farms of the United States.

I submit as Appendix C to my remarks a sketch by the New York World, of January 7, 1908, on this subject.

The overcertification of checks, for the convenience of the gamblers, by the national banks is prohibited by law (section 5208), but I am advised this is evaded on a vast scale every day, the broker getting his check certified, when he has no deposit and no security, in order to buy the security, which is then placed as collateral to his demand note.

I understand the law is evaded by putting up a demand note secured by the stock named, and then before business hours close the collateral is bought and delivered to the bank extending this advance credit. This practice, being a part of the gambling machinery, should be forbidden by law, because it is one of the potent agencies by which this gambling is successfully carried on.

Mr. President, this recent panic was undoubtedly promoted by the speculations in stock in New York and by the great "bull" movement which had been engineered through several years and a more recent but equally great "bear" movement, which resulted in the ruin of hundreds of thousands of small financiers and of thousands of other business people and of some financiers who were not small.

It is a very easy thing, Mr. President, for a bank to loan money on the security of stocks of a definite market value, which are attractive because they are regarded as quick assets. This process had become a fixed practice in New York, so that over one-half of the deposits in New York were loaned out to the speculative buyer of stocks; but every bank in the United States has a deposit in New York, every bank looks to New York as a place from which it may obtain money in time of need, every bank keeps its reserve in New York on the implied contract that if the depositing bank needs a credit of currency, it is entitled to demand it and to receive it.

Obviously this implied contract is impossible of fulfillment if the New York bank lends over one-half of these credits to the speculators on the stock exchange. It follows that the use of these credits on the stock exchange really necessitates the withdrawal of such credits from the channels of trade, from the uses of commerce, from the service of the manufacturer, the producing classes in agriculture and in mines, and from the merchants and the transportation companies, and involves the breach of the implied contract with the depositing banks of the nation.

If these funds had not been loaned out for speculative purposes on the stock exchange, they would have been available for our national commerce, where these funds properly, justly, and wisely belong.

It was our excess of exports at last, from September to December, 1907, that saved the country from a worse calamity. (S. Doc. 208, 60th Cong., 1st sess., p. 16.)

Any adequate measure for the protection of this country against future panic should forbid the national banks who operate under the charter of the United States from loaning the national deposits and reserves in their hands for the speculative buying of stocks, agricultural or food products.

The committee bill entirely ignores this obvious necessity.

And the chairman of the Committee on Finance invites us to be content with a very small measure of relief on the ground that a small measure of relief is all that we could expect at this time.

Mr. President, the country expects as substantial a measure of relief as we have the wit and patriotism to devise.

Does the chairman of the Committee on Finance think the national banks should be allowed to crystallize our national reserves in speculative buying on the stock exchange? Does he think Congress will or should refuse this obvious measure of justice to the commerce of the nation?

Does he think that the country will be content to allow the national reserves to be withdrawn from the legitimate demands of commerce, from the legitimate demands of the manufacturers, producers, and merchants of this country and for dangerous and vicious gambling purposes?

Will he refuse this remedy against the evil condition from which this country has just emerged? As the Senator from Rhode Island and as chairman of the Finance Committee, does he favor the continuance of this monstrous evil?

The banks of New York, which in October last held a large part of the national reserves, refused to pay currency, refused their depositors their just demands, and, with the reserve funds of the whole of the United States in their hands, they were compelled to decline the demands of their depositors, even where the money was needed for moving the crops. Oklahoma cotton could not be paid for and shipped to market promptly because currency was denied on Oklahoma's New York reserves.

Mr. President, I know that the New York banks failed in this particular most reluctantly. I believe they did their best to deliver themselves from the conditions in which they had placed themselves and to deliver the country from the ruinous condition to which they had exposed the country by this dangerous practice; but, Mr. President, their critical condition, their complete panic, was due to the fact that over one-half of the enormous deposits in their hands were tied up in loans for the speculative buying of stocks which they dared not liquidate.

If they had compelled the borrower to have sold these stocks on the open market for cash, the stocks would have been broken to a point which would have ruined the good name of this Republic throughout the civilized world.

I believe the New York banks did wisely not to press their borrowers on stocks to instant bankruptcy.

The speculative buyers of stocks and bonds, as it was, have been pushed in many instances to the point of severe liquidation, to the utter ruin of thousands of them financially and in other ways. Many men have committed suicide because of this panic, as did the president of the Knickerbocker Trust Company.

But, Mr. President, the fact remains that all of these evils have flowed directly from the loaning of the national deposits for stock gambling, and I earnestly insist that no measure intended to protect this country against future panic is adequate which fails to provide a check on the use of our national deposits and reserves for the speculative buying of stocks, bonds, and agricultural products.

Even from the point of view of those who operate on the exchanges, it is better for them to check these dangerous practices and save them from themselves, for the great majority drift ultimately to ruin, and those who succeed by successfully appropriating by artifice the property of their fellows will surely find but little happiness in such successes, and their great intelligence could be made very useful in other lines of endeavor that would promote the common good.

STABILITY OF COMMERCE.

Mr. President, the most important element of our continued national prosperity is to obtain stability of commerce. A man engaged in business where conditions are stable can forecast his business future. He can make definite plans. He can foresee the results of industry, providence, and integrity.

Where conditions are unstable, industry and integrity avail nothing, and conditions are unstable in a country where custom and usage has established the giving and receiving of credit as a necessary part of its commerce. Conditions in the United States have proven to be less stable, perhaps, than in any of the great civilized nations of the world, and the reason for this is that there has been no law preserving the country from panic and no law establishing a proper correlation between the banks and our commerce.

Mr. President, the first duty imposed by the charter of the Bank of France is that which directs the governor of that bank to see that the "bank performs its duty to the state and toward the commerce and industry of the country." Moreover, the executive officers are appointed by the political head of France, "the President of France." Financiers form a minority and the members of the commercial and manufacturing classes and government officials a majority of the board of directors.

The banks of the United States also owe a duty to the state and toward the commerce and industry of the United States which the law should enable and require them to perform. It has long been the custom of the Bank of France to let the French people have money at the unvarying rate of 3 per cent, believing that stability in the rate of interest gives stability to commercial enterprise and promotes the welfare of commerce and industry of the country, which is the chief duty of the Bank of France. How does this compare with the rate of interest permitted and encouraged and established by usage, under our national laws, by the banks of New York, which hold our national reserves? Our ubiquitous, omniscient press advises the country to-day that money on call in New York is 2 per cent, to-morrow 8 per cent on call, the next day 25 per cent, and the next day 60 per cent on call, or perhaps 100 per cent. The most violent and unreasonable fluctuations of interest are announced in the public press and sent broadcast to every city, town, village, and hamlet in the land.

It avails nothing to say, Mr. President, that this violent fluctuation of interest is due to gambling on the stock exchange, using the reserves of the United States for this purpose. What I wish to point out is that this violent fluctuation of interest due to gambling disturbs the peace and confidence of the country. It disturbs and makes impossible that stability in the financial and commercial world which is essential to the peace and prosperity of this Republic. We permit this gambling to go on and raise no voice against it, and yet, when these gambling elements create a stupendous panic that shocks the world the Treasury of the United States is called upon to throw itself into the breach and save the country from the necessary consequences of this imprudent, improper, and scandalous condition permitted by our Government. Mr. President, I do not believe that I shall stand in the minority in this Senate in the demand that the gambling in the reserves of the United States shall be stopped on the stock exchanges.

I shall make no present objection to those who are fond of gambling if they gamble with their own money and gamble with each other, but when they gamble with my money which I have put in the New York banks as my reserve, for my uses, and when they allure into their gambling dens the untried youth and the ignorant adults of the country and rob them of their property, of their peace of mind, and their self-respect, and destroy the stability of the commerce of this country by a panic which their unwise and vicious conduct produces, I feel it my duty to enter an earnest protest.

I demand, Mr. President, a statute which shall summarily end these evil and dangerous practices.

BANK OFFICERS SHOULD BE RESTRICTED IN LOANING MONEY TO THEMSELVES.

Eighth. Another one of the reasons why this panic occurred may be found in certain New York banks where the acting bank officers made improper loans of money to themselves, and although this contributing cause is well known, the committee bill makes no provision forbidding its repetition. This is said to have been the ruin of the Walsh bank and kindred institutions in Chicago and of the Morse banks and allied concerns in New York.

Mr. President, with the example of Chicago and the great bank failure there, due to the unwise loan of the depositors' funds by the active president of the bank to himself, and with a like notable illustration in New York, it seems to me that this cause which has contributed to disturbing confidence should be removed. The violence of this recent panic was precipitated in New York, when conditions were otherwise critical, principally by the charge and belief that the active officials of certain banks and great financial institutions had abused their positions of trust in this respect.

What objection can there be to forbidding an active official of a bank loaning himself the money trusted to his charge, except under the strictest safeguard! The reason of this, Mr. President, is so obvious, that an objection to it would seem to be absurd. I do not think it necessary to do more than to mention the necessity of this action, since the fault to be corrected is one of the recognized contributing causes of panic. There can be no excuse to omit this precaution.

COMMITTEE BILL DOES NOT REQUIRE A PROPER ADJUSTMENT OF THE BANK RESERVES.

Ninth. The committee bill, while at first proposing that the national banking associations outside the reserve cities should keep 10 per cent of their deposits in legal money, finally struck out this provision and failed to insert any equivalent of the proposition requiring the banks to strengthen the interior reserves, but does insert a provision requiring no reserve against $250,000,000 of Government deposit, all of which ought to be held as reserve either by the banks or by the United States Treasury.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance argues with great earnestness and with convincing force the absolute necessity of a proper cash reserve, and finally contents himself with making no improvement whatever in our present defective reserve system and then recommends, as an anticlimax, that no reserve whatever shall be required on United States deposits.

I confess I do not understand the chairman of the Committee on Finance. He strenuously urges the necessity of remedy and then proposes remedies which by his own argument are confessedly inefficient and entirely ineffective to remedy the conditions which he is obliged to know have heretofore been contributing causes of panic.

These interior banks had on August 22, 1907, $182,000,000 of cash reserve against $2,627,000,000 in deposits (Comptroller's Report, 1907, p. 220), less than one-half the cash they are supposed to carry. A 10 per cent reserve for these banks would mean $262,000,000 instead of $182,000,000, an increase of $80,000,000. In increasing these reserves in lawful money it would, of course, be measurably done at the reduction of the reserves in the banks of the reserve cities, but this could be done without inconvenience or harm to the reserve city banks.

The increase of $80,000,000 for the interior banks is somewhat larger than would really be necessary, and I think the committee was therefore justified in striking out this requirement; but I think the committee was in serious error in making no adequate substitute provision for a proper adjustment of the reserve, for the reason that the reserve is of extreme importance in preventing panic.

It is easy to strengthen these reserves and to distribute them without in the least taxing the banks, as I shall show in detail in discussing the substitute I shall propose.

The national banks have only seven hundred and one millions of available cash, and under the laws which are more powerful than any Congress can pass, the laws of human usage and custom, the laws of convenience, this amount can not be easily increased without serious constrictions of credit.

The amount, however, can be easily redistributed under a plan that shall not disturb the gross amount of available currency, and this ought to be done as a precaution against panic and also with a view to using such reserves in currency for the establishment of the stability of our commerce.

By reducing the cash reserve of central reserve cities to 20 per cent and requiring them to keep 5 per cent of municipal bonds as a basis of emergency currency there would be released about seventy-five millions of currency and make available sixty millions additional emergency currency.

By requiring other reserve cities to carry an actual cash reserve of 15 per cent it would add to their actual reserve about twenty-nine millions cash, and 10 per cent of bonds for emergency notes would make available for them one hundred and forty-two millions additional emergency notes, if needed.

By requiring interior banks to keep 9 per cent of their reserves in actual cash it would increase their actual cash reserves about fifty-four millions, and 6 per cent of bonds for emergency notes would make available for their immediate use, if needed, the further sum of about one hundred and fifty-seven millions—a gross amount of three hundred and sixty-four millions of available emergency circulation, with no increase in present reserve required. These results would follow without adding a dollar to the reserves now required by law, merely by requiring "open accounts with reserve agents" to be put in bonds for emergency currency, which would pay more than the interest now paid by the reserve agent.

[b] This plan releases forty-seven millions cash to the country banks and would lower the reserve required by about twelve millions.
[c] This would increase cash required thirty-seven millions, supplied from reserve cities, and would increase gross interior reserves actually available by using bonds for emergency notes, in lieu of open credits with reserve agents.
[d] Gross reserves the same as at present.

The actual cash now on hand would not be added to, but would be so distributed that our moving crops and our commerce could be more conveniently served than under the present distribution of the available banking currency of the United States.

This rearrangement is provided in the substitute I shall propose.

Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] pointed out what was literally true with regard to the reserve held by our country banks—that only 7.4 per cent need be kept as cash under our present laws. This is set forth with great care by the Comptroller of the Currency, on page 72, Report 1907, which I respectfully submit. This clearly demonstrates that there is but 7.4 per cent of cash really required to be kept by the banks under the present statute against the deposits in the country banks, and this amount leaves an insufficient margin for the transaction of business whenever a crisis occurs.

And even this narrow amount need not be kept on hand if there be permitted the practice of double-heading or exchanging credits between banks for the purpose of padding their accounts.

The present measure should carefully correct the weakness of this system, for the reserves of the national banks are relied on by the State banks and trust companies to cover deposits twice as great. The national banks really hold the practical reserve of seven hundred millions against the nation's gross deposits of about thirteen thousand millions, or a cash reserve less than 6 per cent.

CASH RESERVE ON DEPOSITS OF $10,000,000 IN INTERIOR BANKS.

Table showing what the law permits to be done with the alleged cash reserve.

	Amounts of deposits.	Cash reserve in vaults.	Deposited with reserve agents.	Possible loans.
Country banks	$10,000,000	$600,000	$900,000	$8,500,000
Reserve city banks (amounts above deposited by country banks), 9 per cent	900,000	[a]112,500	[a]112,500	675,000
Central reserve city banks (amount as above deposited by reserve city banks)[b]	[a]112,500	[c]28,125	.....	84,375
Total	11,012,500	740,625	1,012,500	9,259,375
Per cent of total deposits	.....	6¾	9¼	84
Per cent of original deposits	.....	7⅜	10¼	92½

[a] One-half of one-fourth.
[b] Twenty-five per cent of 9 per cent.
[c] One-fourth of one-half of one-fourth of 9 per cent.

Amount of cash outside original country banks, $140,625, or 1.4 per cent.

By exchanging credits even this reserve can be diminished substantially.

Tenth. Mr. President, the committee measure imposes only a 6 per cent penalty, and therefore if for any reason the rate of interest in any part of this country should rise higher than 6 per cent, these emergency notes might be easily made a permanent addition to our circulation at such a point, and the tax on these notes should therefore be increased periodically, so that their retirement shall be made compulsory.

The rate of interest on these bonds is a matter of importance, and no bond bearing in excess of 5 per cent should be permitted, because otherwise the penalty on the emergency notes might be insufficient for compulsory retirement.

No provision is found in the committee measure providing for this contingency, while such a precaution would seem judicious.

The compulsory retirement of these emergency notes is of essential importance. With the law drawn in such a manner that the compulsory retirement is assured, there could be no possible reason for regarding this statute as a dangerous precedent, even if the issue were United States notes instead of United States notes under the form of national-bank notes, as the chairman of the Finance Committee has suggested.

It would be no more dangerous and no more liable to cause a public demand for a continual enlargement of the issue than the precedent set by the clearing-house certificate, which is only issued as an emergency measure and which is similarly taxed and instantly retired when the need passes.

The banks of the country are opposed to the issue of clearing-house certificates or cashier's checks or any other device of this kind forced on them by a panic, and the fact that they use such devices does not constitute a dangerous precedent and will not ultimately lead to a demand for a "continual enlargement" of the issue. Every bank in the country will be glad to get back to a normal condition, and would be glad to be allowed to stay in a normal condition.

The fact is, Mr. President, the issuance of 6,600 different forms of national-bank notes as emergency circulation under a 6 per cent penalty would be more apt to make an unwise precedent than the issue of such notes as United States notes, for the obvious reason that there would be 6,600 banks who could make the argument that these notes which they issue are good without the bonds behind them and without the 6 per cent penalty.

Why should they not contend hereafter that 3 per cent would be sufficient or 2 per cent would be sufficient?

The present asset currency is based upon this very contention, and has gathered considerable force throughout the country, and has great merit where safeguarded and under penalty to prevent permanent inflation.

The committee plan of inviting the issuance of these emergency notes as bank notes is more likely to prove a bad precedent than the issue of such emergency notes as Treasury notes, although no danger need be apprehended from either form.

The committee measure, confessedly a measure to prevent panic, fails to provide that which is by far the most important precaution against panic. This precautionary measure is the removal of the fear of the depositor. It is only the fear of the depositor which causes panic. The soul of a panic, its great moving force, is the fear felt by the depositor and his consequent hoarding of currency. I shall discuss this more fully in connection with the substitute measure which I have had the honor to submit, and shall show that this precaution will cost neither the depositor nor the Government anything; that it would benefit both; that it will not hurt State banks; that the objections made to this precaution are entirely unsound.

PROPOSED SUBSTITUTE.

The substitute which I shall move as an amendment to the committee bill takes great pains to provide against every objection made to the committee measure, and it contains those features of the committee measure which are of value.

1. It proposes United States notes (for emergency use) which are by law "legal tender."

2. It provides a method of instant issue when the emergency arises.

3. It provides not only the issue to some national banks in a limited way, but makes the provision against panic available to any national bank or to any State bank or to any trust company or savings banks which puts up the necessary security to the Government.

4. It uses the same form of bonds as the committee measure for collateral, to wit, "the bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of any State, city, town, county, municipality, or district legally organized which has existed ten years and never defaulted in principal or interest of any funded debt;" but it also provides the use of United States bonds, which is not provided by the committee measure, and strikes out railroad bonds, which are provided by the committee measure.

5. The substitute provides emergency notes in any quantity which proves to be necessary, whereas the committee bill confines the issue to five hundred millions and then puts such restrictions on it that the available issue will be extremely limited at any point of original need.

6. The substitute imposes a tax of 6 per cent for the first four months, 8 per cent for the succeeding months, and compulsory retirement within twelve months. The committee bill is content with a 6 per cent tax. The substitute forbids the use of bonds bearing interest in excess of 5 per cent. The committee measure puts no limitation on the interest a bond may bear.

7. The substitute restrains active officers of a bank borrowing the funds of a bank, except under safeguard. The committee measure ignores this precaution against panic.

8. The substitute forbids the use of deposits for speculative buying of stocks, bonds, agricultural or food products, because this has been a potent cause of panic. The committee bill leaves this evil in full force.

9. The substitute bill requires interior banks to have 9 per cent cash reserves, reserve city banks to have 15 per cent cash reserves, central reserve banks to have 20 per cent cash reserves, and requires banks to carry bonds available for emergency notes as a balance of the reserve now required by law. The committee measure is content with requiring no reserve on Federal deposits.

10. The substitute specifies that only the net favorable balance of accounts with reserve agents shall be permitted as a part of the legal reserve, a matter important in preventing panic. Upon this question the committee bill is silent.

11. The substitute provides the insurance by the national banks of their deposits by using the tax paid by the national banks on their normal and emergency circulation.

This is the most important precaution against panic. The committee measure refused this protection.

12. The substitute safeguards the State banks from injury under the insurance plan by putting into effect the insurance feature only after March 1, 1910, except in States having the insurance plan for State banks, and prevents any abuse of the insurance plan by limiting the deposits insured to noninterest-bearing deposits.

Mr. President, in discussing the essential features of the substitute bill I shall confine myself to those features of this bill which differ essentially from the principles laid down in the committee measure and which have not already been sufficiently explained. I take it for granted that the majority of the members of the Senate are in favor of emergency currency, properly secured under a penalty sufficient to compel the contraction of such emergency currency when the exigency has passed. I take it for granted that this body is in favor of a sufficient quantity and quality of such emergency currency to meet the conditions of panic sufficiently, and that the remedy shall not be a partial remedy, but shall be drawn to meet completely and completely prevent any future panic.

Waiving discussion of these recognized essentials, I shall now point out the reasons why the substitute measure is superior to the measure proposed by the committee.

THE COLLATERAL IS BETTER.

Mr. President, the collateral proposed by the substitute measure is better collateral.

The committee measure denies the use of United States bonds, and inserts in lieu thereof railroad bonds.

The substitute reverses this and strikes out railroad bonds and inserts United States bonds.

What excuse there is for refusing to the bonds issued by the people of the United States this quality which has great financial value and giving this financial value to bonds of private persons and private corporations I know not.

It will not do to say that the volume of bonds of the United States, of the States, of the cities, towns, counties, municipalities, and district are insufficient in volume, because that would not be true. Their volume is abundant. It will not do to say that these bonds, issued for public purposes, are not as good as railroad bonds, because they are better and fluctuate far less.

It will not do to say that it is a matter of indifference whether you prefer one or the other, because it is not a matter of indifference. It is a matter of an important value in dollars and cents, measurable not in a small way, but in a large way; giving this value to the bonds issued by the people is to give those bonds values worth hundreds of millions, giving this function to railroad bonds will be worth hundreds of millions to the holders of such railroad bonds.

I have already pointed out, Mr. President, the manner in which these bonds have risen in value during the month of January, 1908, within which the chairman of the Committee on Finance brought in his remarkable proposition, and I insist that the full measure of this value shall go to the people of the United States, and that public bonds alone shall be used; and that these values shall not go to the railroad bondholders, and that they shall not be used for this purpose.

It is measurably true that this value being given to railroad bonds would go to the people of the United States; it is true it would go to some of the people of the United States who own these bonds; it would probably go to one person out of a thousand, who is a railroad bondholder, but, principally, it would go to a very few men who are the great railroad bondholders of the United States, and this bill would be a bill to give them the value in this way which ought to go to the people of the United States in their public capacity.

I do not feel content to agree that these values should be put in the hands of a few individuals, even if those individuals, inspired by generosity, or humanitarianism, or by any other worthy motive which inspires the human heart, were willing to give it all back before they die, as in fact they ought to do.

This country has been subjected long enough to the favor of private interests. I think it my duty to protest against the effect of this proposed committee measure in this regard, although well assured of the patriotic purpose of the remedy proposed. I can readily understand how the committee thought they would enlarge the bonds available for this purpose. I can readily understand that the committee thought the use of railroad bonds would be entirely safe, and so they are. It is not on account of their safety, but for the reason which I give that I insist that the substitute measure is better than the committee measure, because it uses United States bonds, which the committee measure does not allow, and it refuses railroad bonds, which the committee measure does allow.

UNITED STATES NOTES ARE BETTER THAN NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

The committee measure prefers to use national-bank notes as emergency currency; the substitute prefers United States notes. Mr. President, either class of these notes are as good as gold. Section 6 of the committee measure directly makes these national-bank notes as good as gold. They are made redeemable "in lawful money" at the Treasury, and section 7 further provides that all of the national-bank notes, amounting to over six hundred millions in our normal circulation, shall be payable in "lawful money" or equivalent of gold, changing the present statute status of national-bank notes, which makes them redeemable in "United States notes." I approve the change.

The quality of notes in either the committee measure or the substitute proposed is first class, the equivalent of gold, but the objection to the committee measure is, that it provides for 6,600 varieties of notes, each one differing in form from the other, each one requiring a special plate in the Bureau of Engraving, each one requiring an independent account to be kept of such notes, whereas the simpler, more economical method would be to have one form of Treasury note and one form of engraved plate and one account to be kept of these outstanding emergency notes in lieu of six thousand and more of these accounts, etc.

Another objection to these national-bank notes is that it will encourage the future demand to lower the tax on these emergency notes and thus encourage enlarging the volume of these national-bank notes, which is not desirable.

Another objection to these national-bank notes is that they comprise a pretense.

They pretend to be national-bank notes.

The banks do not really issue these notes.

The bank officials need not sign these notes to make them current among the people.

The Government of the United States makes this issue of national-bank notes, controls every item and every particular in the form, manner, use, and redemption of such pretended national-bank notes.

I do not like the pretense.

The immediate consequences which flow from this pretense, and which have greatly impaired the value of the committee measure, are as follows:

THE COMMITTEE LIMITATIONS RUINOUS TO THE PROPOSED RELIEF.

The very fact that these notes are pretended to be national-bank notes leads immediately to the proposition found in the first three lines of the bill, to wit:

> That no national bank which has circulating notes outstanding less than 50 per cent of its capital stock shall be allowed to issue emergency notes, and no national bank which has a surplus of less than 20 per cent of the capital stock shall issue emergency notes.

If these were United States notes and were not national-bank notes, no such reasoning would suggest itself. No such limitations would be suggested. The limitations are very illogical and unreasonable.

In the first case, because a national bank has been extremely conservative and has not issued any more of its notes than the law compels, it is penalized and denied emergency notes, which at some time may be essential to its life.

Because the bank has carefully limited its outstanding liabilities and made itself more worthy of credit, it is to be denied the relief extended to those less worthy.

The absurdity of this proposition is so manifest that a child could see it.

And no national bank, in the second place, which has not 20 per cent surplus shall be allowed emergency notes, although it is willing to put up a first-class collateral 10 per cent in excess of the proposed issue. Its danger may be vital, its necessity compelling, and yet this bill denies them emergency notes upon a security confessedly more than sufficient.

Will any sound reason be offered for such limitation?

Certainly the chairman of the Committee on Finance, in explaining his bill, made no explanation whatever of these objections which I point out.

Again, Mr. President, the committee measure forbids any national bank to have the security against panic of this proposed remedy, except to the limited extent that its normal circulation and its emergency circulation shall not exceed the gross amount of its capital and surplus.

What an amazing restriction this is!

How grossly unreasonable.

How utterly lacking in foresight.

How destructive of the purposes of this proposed remedy against panic.

Why, Mr. President, the demand upon a bank in times of panic is not measured by its capital and surplus. It is measured by its deposits and the demand of its depositors.

The capital and surplus may be three millions, its deposits may be thirty-five millions.

The Knickerbocker Trust Company (which was recently driven to its death) out of its own resources paid millions before it surrendered. Under this bill that trust company could not have had any relief whatever, yet it had a demand liability of its deposits to the extent of $67,665,000. This committee measure now proposes a plan that would limit the extent of relief against panic to be afforded such a bank to nothing, notwithstanding the fact that this trust company should be prepared to put in the hands of the Government collateral, confessedly of the first class, far in excess of the value of the issue, and notwithstanding the fact that this company would, upon such gilt-edge collateral, be paying the Federal Government Treasury a substantial tax of 6 per cent for the use of such money.

What good reason can the chairman of the Committee on Finance give to the Senate for refusing this relief against panic to this institution, when beleaguered by the demands of its frightened depositors, and when this institution is willing and anxious to put up first-class collateral?

Are we trying to prevent panic?

Are we trying to afford an abundant and sufficient remedy?

Or are we merely proposing to present the shadow and deny the substance?

But the limitations of the committee measure do not stop with denying to these national banks the reasonable relief to which by every canon of reason and good sense they are entitled, but the committee measure deliberately omits from this measure every State bank, every trust company, every savings bank, and every other bank in the United States.

The national banks have only one-third of the banking capital of the United States. They have less than a third of the deposits of the United States, and a panic could sweep this country and never close a national bank. The hoarding of currency might come entirely through State banks.

The State banks only carry a net reserve in currency of between 4 and 5 per cent, and they have nearly nine thousand millions of individual deposits, and their distress for currency may close factories and merchants' stores and enterprises innumerable from Maine to California because of a lack of currency, and this committee measure, which proposes a remedy against future panic, is presented to this Senate with a denial to these great State institutions whose welfare and whose solvency is absolutely essential to the welfare of our national commerce.

I am amazed, Mr. President, at this most serious omission on the part of the committee bill.

In the substitute which I shall propose as an amendment, the State banks, trust companies, and savings banks are provided for.

But the committee measure not only denies to many national banks any relief whatever; it not only denies to the national banks an abundant relief by limiting the amount of currency to the capital and surplus; it not only denies any relief whatever to any State bank, trust company, savings bank, or other bank, but it goes still further and says that the proposed remedy shall be still further limited by distributing the proposed relief in a manner—

> As equitable as practicable between the various sections of the country.

> The Secretary of the Treasury shall not approve applications from associations in any State in excess of the amount to which such State would be entitled on the basis of the proportion which the unimpaired capital and surplus of the national banking associations in such State bears to a total amount of unimpaired capital and surplus of the national banking associations of the United States.

This language of "equitable" apportionment has a virtuous sound, but a most dangerous and harmful meaning. What it really means is that this proposed remedy against panic, even if under the limitations imposed upon the several national banks it were completely available, the average relief to the country against panic of these emergency notes would be limited to less than $11,000,000 to each State. What is the purpose of this limitation, and why are these emergency notes, essential as they are to protect our country against panic, bound so readily by innumerable limitations so as to make the relief feature ineffective? This last limitation almost entirely destroys the value of the proposed remedy.

The so-called "equitable" distribution of this remedy would make the remedy itself utterly ineffective, and I commend the reasoning of the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] in his approval of the relief offered by the Secretary of the Treasury to New York when he said—

> He might have followed the strict letter of the law, which the Senator has quoted, and put the $240,000,000 of Government (funds) proportionately in each one of the 6,600 banks of the country. The effect would have been, so far as relief is concerned, like meeting a great fire in a great city, where property is likely to be consumed of such value as to impair the business of the whole country, not with the concentration of all the resources of the fire department upon the fire and blowing up with dynamite of adjoining blocks to prevent its spreading, as they did in San Francisco, but to distribute the fire engines all over the city and demand them to divide the water equitably among the different wards. The Secretary fearlessly and wisely says he deposited the money where it would be most effective, and the result demonstrated the wisdom of his action.

This reasoning of the Senator from New York is sound and it is also a forcible demonstration of the utter inefficiency of the limitations proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Under the provisions of this proposed remedy the State of New York, which in the last panic needed more than four hundred millions to stop the panic, would be allowed to receive under this bill less than one hundred millions. The chairman of the Committee on Finance takes some pains to advise the banks of the country that the suspension of bank payments with its resulting strain upon the credit of the country will not again be tolerated, and he says with great force that "the failure of the bank to meet its demand obligations is a violation of every law governing its conduct" and existence, and that "bank managers should realize that a repetition of these violations will not be permitted," and having thus given a solemn warning to the bank managers that they shall not hereafter relieve their own distresses by their own devices, he offers as an abundant remedy an emergency circulation which he so limits and surrounds with conditions that its future failure to relieve the bankers is made reasonably certain.

It looks to me this bill will prove an anæsthetic to prepare us for a future operation, a future bear raid on the commerce and industries of the nation.

We have just had what the farmers call a "hog-killing" time, and somebody has canned the lard. The physical properties of the country still remain, but the change of ownership from weak hands to strong hands is obvious to any man who is not feeble minded.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance himself advises us in his speech upon this question of the extraordinary steps which were taken to avoid final disaster, and which did not avoid final disaster. He points out the deposit of public money in New York and other banks between September 30 and December 7 to the extent of $70,000,000.

Second. Of clearing-house certificates, $190,000,000.

Third. Of checks intended for currency, $75,000,000.

Fourth. A forced enlargement of bank-note circulation from October 1 to January 1, $94,759,115.

Fifth. Gold importations of $107,000,000 (the exclusive product of our cotton and wheat), and he fails to count over two hundred millions which were bought by a 4 per cent commission bringing hoarded currency into new circulation; he fails to count innumerable devices throughout the country which are not a matter of record by which currency was brought from hiding.

And he fails to point out that every dollar drawn from hiding by the taxing power of the United States was instantly redeposited in circulation. He fails to point out that there was two hundred millions of public funds placed with national-bank depositors to assist in this critical demand for currency through which the country was being forced in 1907.

And he fails to mention the effort made by the President and Secretary of the Treasury to reestablish public confidence by the offer to the country of one hundred millions of 3 per cent clearing-house certificates, and fifty millions of Panama bonds, which had a hypnotic effect upon the country favorable to confidence and which helped to abate the terrible panic under which the country was staggering.

I pause, Mr. President, in my remarks, to say that I feel it my duty to commend the President of the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury, in offering at this critical period the 3 per cent certificates and the Panama bonds.

I do not care to debate the question of whether the offer was justified under the strict construction of the law, waiving that point and granting, for the sake of argument, that the offer was not thoroughly justified under the strictest construction of the statute, nevertheless the emergency of this panic, in my judgment, justified the President in this effort to relieve the country from its danger. If I had been invited to express an opinion before this offer was made I should not have failed to recommend it, and having been the beneficiary of the action of the Executive I am not willing to be silent and to withhold my commendation of the Executive act.

I trust that the legislation now being framed shall be drawn in such a manner as to make it unnecessary from this time forward ever to resort to similar measures for the relief of panic. More than a thousand million was needed to control the last panic and then it was not effectively controlled.

But under the remedy now offered us by the committee measure, the storm center—New York—would receive less than one hundred million.

Mr. President, our banking capital has grown in seventeen years 236 per cent, and in seventeen years more it will be as much greater by 236 per cent of the present banking capital. This bill is drawn not for to-day; it is drawn for the future and no limitation of $250,000,000, as first proposed by the chairman of the Finance Committee, nor $500,000,000, as now reported by the committee, will be adequate in ten years, even if it were adequate now.

The committee measure is fatally defective in putting this limitation of volume on these emergency notes. The substitute I shall offer, Mr. President, puts no limitation upon the emergency notes proposed except found in the words, "this act shall not be construed to limit the issue of such notes if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury an emergency exists for a larger issue than the amount required to be prepared by this act."

DEPOSITS AND RESERVES SHOULD NOT BE USED FOR SPECULATIVE PURPOSES.

Sixth. The substitute is superior to the committee measure because it forbids the use of the national reserves held as deposits in the national banks to be loaned for the speculative buying of stocks or bonds, agricultural or food products. The committee measure is confessedly drawn to prevent panic. One of the most potent causes of panic is the loaning of the national reserves and deposits sent to New York for the speculative buying of stocks.

Such loans, while supposed to be quick assets, are in point of fact not quick assets. Every bank and trust company in the United States keeps a balance in New York upon which they rely for cash and which is always available for cash except in time of panic, but when panic ensues and the depositors of the New York banks begin to hoard money, these reserves in New York are no longer available for cash. Nor can the national banks which are making loans for the speculative buying of stocks force such speculative borrowers to pay cash at such a season. If they do, they make the panic still worse, and by beating down the prices of stock through such forced liquidation they increase the alarm throughout the whole of the United States. These stock quotations are printed on the pages of tens of millions of daily papers, and these quotations go to every city, town, and hamlet in the land. If the New York banks compelled liquidation of the five hundred million they had loaned out on these stocks last fall, it would have broken stocks to a point which would have alarmed the country most seriously. The attempted remedy would have been worse than the disease. As it was, the contraction of credits by the banks in the reserve cities was largely responsible for the fall in the price of stocks, and there are more ways to contract credits than by refusing a loan.

The contraction of credit, which caused the great "bear" market, was in refusing to loan as much money on stocks, from time to time, as had been previously loaned on such stocks.

All the banks had to do to cause a "bear" movement and the lowering of the prices of stocks was to withdraw the extension of credit to such stocks on the higher value and assume a lower value as a basis of loans; to ask more collateral in stocks on maturing loans. If a bank says I will lend you money on Amalgamated Copper with a 20 per cent margin, estimating Amalgamated Copper at 120, the stock would be affected by this extension of credit. If the banks were unanimous in refusing to recognize Amalgamated Copper as worth more than 110, its market value would fall to that point. If they were unanimous in refusing to recognize the value of that stock as in excess of 60 on making loans, its price would fall to 60, because these prices are fixed in the speculative markets and the banks fix the measure of the value of such stocks handled on the stock exchange by limiting the loans on such stocks. I regard the operation of this financial policy as certain in its operation as the law of gravity.

A community of interest among the New York banks, concerted action in credit extensions, could establish through the stock exchange the most powerful money and credit trust on earth.

But I call the attention of the Senate to the tremendous fluctuations in the prices of these stocks. Amalgamated Copper about a year ago was worth over 100 per cent of what it is to-day, and was so recognized by the banks as a basis for loans. The game of finance on Wall street is a great game and the masters of finance can control and direct the prices of stocks with reasonable precision. It is no idle figure of speech to speak of the speculative class who enter Wall street from the outside as "lambs." They go to their ruin and their property is appropriated by men of higher intellectual force and greater financial power.

The people are induced to buy these stocks and then are induced to sell these stocks by representations made to them with diabolic skill and ingenuity, persuading them in the first case of the great value of the stock and persuading them in the second place that the stock may lose all of its value and is too dangerous to retain. In this way the gamblers on the stock exchange continually steal the property of the ignorant and thoughtless, through the gambling passion, but what is infinitely more serious they unsettle the stability of our commerce and prepare us for panic with its deadly national blight.

A few of the conspicuous samples of the high and low prices I submit, and full tables I submit as Appendices F and G to my remarks.

These ranges are since 1900, and will be found in the New York Times Weekly National Quotation Review, page 13, of October 21, 1907.

heaven in the name of the widows and orphans whose last dollar is invested in these precious securities.

Take the Adams Express Company. The high price of the Adams Express Company stock since 1900 was 315 and the low price 114. Amalgamated Copper, 130 the high price and 33 the low price, a stock involving millions upon millions, and which has been used to steal away millions of dollars from the unsuspecting ignorant classes of this country, and these ignorant classes embrace educated men who, although they seem to be educated, are still ignorant of these refined, insidious processes that are so diabolical and so crafty that only one man in a million can see through them; and so this old, old game of stealing the property of the unwary goes on year after year and year after year and this body sits here, and sits, and sits, supine, and offers no relief. The country expects relief, and as one of the members of this body I demand relief. This bill must be amended. It must provide that this process of stealage and panic shall stop. The people of the United States have a right to make this request. They expect it of this body, and, in their name, the Senator from Oklahoma demands it.

The point I wish to call attention to, however, Mr. President, is the fact that the national banks are used as agencies for carrying on these gambling transactions on the stock exchange. It is, as I have said, the most stupendous gambling palace on the face of the earth, where the intelligence of the victim is drugged and loaded dice and trapdoors prevail. They sold, or pretended to sell, values during the last year of over thirty thousand millions, an average of over one hundred millions a day for every business day in the year. They used for this purpose, on a margin of about 10 per cent, nearly all of the reserves placed on deposit in New York by the banks of this country, and when the critical time came that our national commerce called upon their banks of deposit from Maine to California for the currency necessary to transact the business of our national commerce, the New York banks, who had been engaged in promoting these gambling transactions for profit, and who had by their own tactics caused a gradual reduction in the values of stocks from the beginning of the "bear" movement until its culmination in panic, were unable to respond to their contracts with their correspondent banks. They were unable to pay currency because their own conduct in promoting the great gambling scheme of the stock exchange, which culminated in the panic, frightened the people of the country who had their personal deposits in the banks, and a sudden withdrawal for hoarding took place in New York, tying up within a week an enormous amount of currency. Whether this was promoted by certain "wealthy malefactors," who helped engineer such a scheme and at the critical moment withdrew currency for the purpose of promoting panic, is not material. The point I wish to emphasize is that the use of these reserve funds, on deposit with the New York banks for loans in the speculative market, was one of the direct causes of this recent panic.

The committee measure is avowedly for the purpose of preventing panic.

The most notorious cause of panic are these gambling operations which have threatened the country by the steady contraction of the market price of stocks. The committee measure ignores the chief cause.

The substitute measure is superior to the committee bill because it removes this potential cause of panic.

WHAT IS A LOAN FOR SPECULATIVE PURPOSES?

Mr. President, I have been challenged with the inquiry, What is a loan for speculative purposes?

Mr. President, this question is asked by a lawyer and might be debated by a sophist. It might be asked by one used to critical analysis of language; by one who might plead that any action in life is speculative; that whether we shall arise in the morning or be found dead is speculative; that any business transaction which is not absolutely concluded is speculative, because any exigence which might arise that would remove the issue from the domain of certainty contains an element of uncertainty and of speculation.

In answer to all of this refinement, I say bluntly and plainly that a loan for the speculative buying of stock is as easily ascertained and determined by a competent banker or competent bank examiner as the color of a black horse by a person with two good eyes.

The effect of this proposed statute would be to put the seal of condemnation on the practice of using our national-bank reserves deposited in New York, for gambling purposes to the denial of the legitimate uses of our commerce. A bank examiner who does his duty will speedily point out to the banker who is so obtuse as not to see, or to him who does not wish to see, what is a loan for the speculative buying of stocks, bonds, agricultural or food products.

I insist upon it that this measure which is intended to prevent panic should not close its eyes to the most important contributing cause of panic.

ACTIVE BANK OFFICERS FORBIDDEN TO BORROW.

Seventh. The substitute measure is superior to the committee measure because it removes another potent cause of panic.

It is well known that the action of Morse in borrowing the money intrusted to his keeping for his own uses, in 1907, was the spark which ignited the inflammable material prepared by the gambling transactions above referred to. The powder and dynamite were carefully arranged and Morse was the detonating cap that produced explosion. His property, I am informed, has passed into the hands of those abler and wiser than he, and in the same way the United States Steel has taken over the Tennessee Coal and Iron, and we see the pleasant spectacle of the survival of the fittest, a new instance of the lion and the lamb lying down together.

THE GUARANTY OF DEPOSITS.

The substitute provides that noninterest-bearing deposits in national banks shall be guaranteed out of the tax paid by the national banks on their present circulation and by the proposed tax on emergency circulation.

As I have heretofore pointed out, the tax on the annual circulation is over three millions per annum, and the average loss to depositors of national banks during the last nine years is $85,000 per annum.

There would be no need for so large a guaranty fund except for its moral effect. There is no harm in making it so abundant that confidence in the fund should be assured. There might be harm if the fund were not large enough to thoroughly establish public confidence.

As I have already pointed out, the fear of the depositor is the real cause of hoarding money on a large scale by the people. If you remove the cause for this hoarding, there will be no panic capable of seriously harming our national commerce.

When the depositor is absolutely assured in the security of his deposit, regardless of the solvency of the bank, he has no reason whatever to withdraw his funds, and he has no reason to hoard it.

There is a class of persons who do not keep any bank account because of their distrust. One of the strongest benefits arising from the guaranty of deposits would be to bring out the currency hoarded by this class of people, who at present do not keep any bank account.

The insurance plan would bring into activity a considerable volume of money which is now hidden.

But the value of the insurance plan is not the protection of the depositor; it is the protection of the public; it is the protection of our commerce; it is the promotion of the stability of business conditions which is specially to be desired. The depositor is perfectly safe now, but nevertheless when he takes fright and withdraws currency for hoarding and produces a panic he is very dangerous to our commerce, and it is this danger which should be abated.

I have received a vast number of letters from bankers with regard to the insurance of deposits. The great majority of these letters strongly favor the guaranty plan and give abundant reason therefor. I submit a sample of these letters (Appendix "E"), but I have also received various letters from bankers opposing the idea of the guaranty of deposits.

I have carefully read the letters which oppose this proposition and have scrutinized every objection made.

The first objection is that it will promote reckless banking, which will encourage unscrupulous bankers to offer high interest for deposits, with a view to embezzling the funds of the depositors; that this would be at the expense of the honest bankers of the country. The answer to this is—

First. That interest-bearing deposits are not insured and, therefore, the entire objection fails because the supposititious embezzler has no inducement to offer for deposits, and, moreover, the honest banker pays nothing more under the plan proposed than he does now. It costs him nothing.

Second. In the second place, the embezzlement of funds is made sufficiently unattractive by the criminal code to prevent the predicted embezzlement.

Third. In the third place, the safeguards of national banks are otherwise abundant to prevent embezzlement, and with 6,600 of such banks in the United States the losses for the last nine years has been a negligible quantity. The persons who invest their money in a national bank are subject to a double liability, so that the stockholders of a national bank of the smallest kind put up $25,000 and are liable to a like amount under the law before any harm can come to the depositor. This equals a $50,000 bond to secure fidelity.

No bank can start with any prospect of success that has not a board of local directors favorably known to the community, who comprise a further safeguard.

There is no force whatever in this objection.

Another objection which is offered is that it puts a conservative banker on a par with a reckless banker who will offer special privileges in exchange for deposits.

The answer to this is: He is not allowed to insure an interest-bearing account; the depositor is protected by double liability of the bank's stockholders, and that the depositors are perfectly safe now, as a matter of fact, and there would be no more force in the objection under the new condition of insurance than there is under the present condition of no insurance.

But everybody familiar with the banking business knows that the primary condition of a deposit is the belief of the depositor that the bank is safe. The real factors which control the deposit are the personal friendship of the depositor for the bank, for some of its officers or directors or stockholders; the fact that it is convenient to his business; the fact that he has a right to expect the reasonable business accommodations to which he is entitled. These are the motives which control deposits. The question of the security of the deposit does not control it except in a negative way. A man would not deposit where he had doubt; and if a bank were in the hands of a reckless, extravagant man, the common people can be relied on to find that out, and no such man can attract deposits against a man more honorable and more worthy of trust.

Another objection which is made is that it will do great harm to the State banks, because the State banks will not have a like insurance.

The answer to this is that the national banks for the last nine years have lost their depositors relatively only about $1 where the State banks have lost their depositors $23. The average loss of the State banks has been about $4,000,000 per annum, and the average loss of the national banks has been about $85,000 per year for the last nine years.

Notwithstanding this greater safety of the national banks the State banks have twice as much in deposits. This further discredits the theory of the objection.

It is not true therefore that greater security of the national-bank depositor would break up the State banks. I think it is true that where a small State bank in a town has a small national bank as its rival, under the guaranty plan, it would weaken to some extent the deposits of the State bank, especially in time of panic, if there should ever be a panic under this improved system and in the event that the State did not arrange insurance for the State bank depositors.

But this difficulty has been obviated by putting the insurance plan into effect only after two years shall have passed, to wit, March 1, 1910, except in States where the deposits of State banks have insurance. Within these two years every State can adopt a like precaution for the benefit of the State banks, and no friend of the State banks needs to be afraid that the State banks will not look after their own interest in this respect.

It is highly desirable and of great national importance that every State in the Union should promptly pass a State law providing an insurance plan for the depositors of State banks, and the insurance of the deposits of national banks in the pending measure would lead directly to this desirable consummation.

Even if any State failed to provide an insurance plan, any State bank which felt the slightest harm from the State's omission could take out a national-bank charter, and thus be defended from any loss of deposits from this source.

It should always be kept in mind that it is not the welfare of the bank, nor the welfare of the depositor which is the main object to be attained, but it is the prevention of panic, the protection of our commerce, the stability of business conditions, and the maintenance in active operation of the productive energies of the nation, which is the question of vital importance.

THE RESERVES AFFECTED BY STOCK GAMBLING—PROTECTED BY SUBSTITUTE MEASURE.

Mr. President, the reserves of the State banks and trust companies is about three hundred and ninety millions, against eighty-seven hundred millions of deposits—less than 5 per cent.

The national banks have really available less than seven hundred millions, against a gross deposit of over six thousand millions, and the national banks owe the State banks more money than they have in cash, including all their reserves.

The daily checks drawn against the reserves of all the banks in the United States is equal to at least $2,000,000,000 a day, nearly twice as much as the total amount of all the cash in all the banks. About 5 per cent of these checks are handled in cash, making nearly one hundred millions of cash a day.

These reserves would, nevertheless, be abundant if the country had assurances of peace from the gamblers of the stock exchanges.

It should be remembered, Mr. President, that the gamblers on the stock exchanges are composed of two classes—the bulls and the bears. It is the business of the bear operator to destroy confidence, to break down values, and his resourcefulness in this respect is wonderful.

He uses every power of the public press.

He circularizes the public.

He uses the agencies of the press of every kind and fills the country with suggestions of panic and disaster. He is backed by unlimited wealth, and there is the most substantial reason to believe that he has been backed during the last eighteen months by the wealthiest men in the world, who, not content with fortunes so vast as to be incomprehensible to themselves, have desired to break the stock market for the purpose of using their hoarded currency and hoarded and available cash credits for the appropriation of the stocks and properties held by weaker men. I shall not stop to criticise the moral aspect of this matter. I only desire to emphasize the fact that these bear operators are able to cause violent fluctuations of credit, violent fluctuations of interest rates; that they set out false signals to produce shipwreck for their own profit. It is to stop the disastrous results of their campaigning and to stop their promotion of panic conditions that I earnestly insist upon the remedies proposed in the substitute bill.

First. To prevent the use of national-bank deposits for stock-gambling purposes.

Second. To redistribute the reserves, to withdraw from the central reserve cities a portion of the national reserves actually required for the use of our commerce, to strengthen the reserves of all the banks by bonds suitable for emergency notes.

Third. Chief of all, to provide an insurance plan that will prevent any attack on "confidence" being successfully employed by bear operators against the bank depositor.

Fourth. To provide emergency notes, properly secured, in volume great enough to meet any contingency whatever, and to have such issue taxed in a sum high enough to compel the retirement of such notes when the emergency passes.

When we shall have made panic impossible in this country our great Republic will move forward with a stupendous commercial development that will be the astonishment of the world.

Our resources are infinite, our people the most intelligent, inventive, and active in the world. The measure which is now before this body is the most important bill which has come before the Senate for many years. The great variety of opinions entertained proves beyond doubt the fact that our statesmen do not well understand the problem. But they have the intelligence and patriotism necessary, and should employ the patient industry requisite to its complete mastery, so that this measure when passed shall be perfect. I entertain a profound hope that this question shall be studied in a manner entirely free from all prejudice and with an earnest desire to promote the common welfare of our beloved country.

APPENDIX A.

Remarks of Robert L. Owen on Senate bill 3023.

MUSKOGEE, IND. T., September 26, 1899.

A METHOD OF CONTROLLING FINANCIAL PANICS.

It has been said that so long as human nature remained the same financial panics were unavoidable, the idea being that panics were necessarily caused by the natural tendency to speculate and operate on an unsound basis.

Nothing could be more fallacious or mischievous than this opinion. Certainly unsound speculators must come to ultimate liquidation, but that sound operators must also be ruined in great numbers every ten years by an unavoidable periodic panic is absolutely false.

It is true that the United States has had panics inflicting enormous injury about once in every ten years, ruining thousands of careful and industrious business men through no fault of their own, throwing out of employment many hundreds of thousands of honest workmen, destroying vast property, and exercising a depressing effect on all future enterprises because of the wreckage strewing the shores of the business sea.

It is true that these insensate, unreasoning panics, wrecking the sound as well as the unsound, have been periodic, but it is also true that no effort has been made to prevent them and that they can be easily prevented; that England, Germany, and France have each provided an efficient means of control, whose essential principle is available in the United States; that the English method protects the Irish and Scotch; that the French method protects Belgium and Switzerland, and the German method protects Holland, Denmark, and all the German States.

PANICS ARE UNAVOIDABLE UNDER THE PRESENT LAW.

Under the present laws of the United States panics are unavoidable, indeed absolutely certain, whenever the mutual confidence of the people is shaken, no matter what the reasonable or unreasonable cause. "Want of confidence" is the pregnant cause leading to panic. Want of confidence may be due to the shrinkage of the gold reserve in the United States Treasury; to the shrinkage of the bank reserves; to the failure of some great house previously widely known and trusted, as that of Jay Cooke, in the United States, or Overend, Gurney & Co., in London; to civil revolution, or even to the false suggestion that panics are periodic and due every ten years. The whisper, everywhere current, that we are going to have a panic hypnotizes the public mind and excites that unreasoning fear which is the base of all panics.

In the last panic of 1893 the confidential whisper went out from New York that we were going to have a panic, and the writer of this article, one of thousands, caused the bank of which he was president to reduce the outstanding loans as much as possible and strengthen the reserves by every means available. This course of action, pursued throughout the Union by the banks generally, enormously increased the demand for money, in the same degree diminished the available supply, and put the business world in a condition of high nervous tension.

The banks of New York in 1893 advised their correspondents that the Sherman purchasing act was diminishing confidence in the high standing of the American dollar, was taking gold out of the United States, that until the law was repealed or the agitation was settled they would not be able to extend the accommodations previously afforded to their correspondent banks. The New York banks began to limit new loans to a market which by the force of usage did not anticipate refusal of loans on good security. The banks began to call in loans whose security was unquestionable, and on June 7, 1893, they forced to sudden settlement a vast sum in "call loans" when none of the banks were lending on time. This was the crowning offense against "confidence." The want of "confidence" that immediately set in among the creditors of the banks (that is, their depositors) caused them to take from the banks a vast sum of cash, equal to about $960,000,000, during the course of the events recited, to wit, from March to October, 1893. The banks, though enormously rich, were in great danger of bankruptcy from these withdrawals. They were compelled to resort to various devices to hold their creditors at bay, and among other things they stood back to back for mutual protection and issued clearing-house certificates in New York and Boston exceeding $52,000,000. These certificates relieved the great pressure on the available cash and thus practically supplemented the withdrawal of the currency. Except for this extraordinary act and the readiness of other clearing houses to do the same thing universal suspension might easily have ensued.

DEPOSITS AND CASH.

The banks of the United States in 1893 owed their depositors in March, subject to immediate demand or demand on short notice, the enormous sum of $5,338,000,000, and the total cash they held was about $533,000,000, which included "cash items" in the reports of the State banks, savings banks, trust companies, and private banks, who estimate "cash items" the same as "cash." "Cash items" are not "cash," but checks in transit, and making a reasonable deduction for such items there could not have been exceeding $450,000,000 in cash in all the 9,500 banks in the United States, a sum equal to only 8½ per cent of their deposits.

The banks are obliged to have a certain amount of money in their tills to cash current checks, to make change, etc., which is for practical purposes as much of a fixture as the desks, books, and papers of the bank, and which cash is not available for paying their creditors or making loans. Allowing for "till money" 3½ per cent, would leave about 5 per cent of the deposits as the sole reserve against the demand of the depositors. The like ratio substantially now exists between deposits and cash that existed in 1893, a ratio which makes possible (there being no relief provided against panics) a violent fluctuation in the rate of interest. Money to-day (September 26, 1899) on call in New York is quoted at 20 per cent. It has often been higher, but such a rate shows how unstable the condition is and, moreover, is itself a factor tending to disturb public confidence and bring about a panic.

Of course the national banks of the reserve cities are required to have a reserve not less than 25 per cent of their deposits. The financial reports frequently speak of this great reserve as a bulwark of strength. In sober truth nothing could be more deceitful, because this money regarded as 25 per cent of the deposits is a reserve not only against the private deposits of the New York banks, but is the actual reserve against all the deposits of all the correspondent banks of New York.

If a run for hoarding should take place among the depositors of the country banks who hold their reserves in New York, this so-called "25 per cent" would be quickly exhausted. This 25 per cent reserve is, in fact, not the reserve of the New York banks only, but it is the reserve of the thousands of correspondent banks who keep their surplus money in New York.

Between March and October of 1893 the depositors of the national banks drew out over 18 per cent of their deposits. Granting that the other banks suffered as much (and their average loss was probably more), the total withdrawal of cash was $960,000,000. Of course the cash withdrawn in a large degree was again attracted to the banks, but the striking fact is that a sudden panic, causing a sudden average withdrawal for hoarding of 8½ per cent of the deposits, would have bankrupted or suspended all the banks of the United States. The leading bankers are aware of this relation, and are accordingly tender and easily alarmed when conditions arise likely to disturb public "confidence," and this alarm runs through the banks and the business world like a delicate shock to the nervous system.

It should not be forgotten that there is a class of financiers who make fortune by hoarding money and disturbing "confidence," in order to bear stocks and bonds. "Want of confidence" gives their hoarded funds greater purchasing power and a net gain is made by unloading again on a higher market when "confidence" is restored. This is continually done on a small scale, but there is also grave reason to believe it is occasionally done on a vast scale. Certainly strong operators holding large masses of cash loaned on call or hoarded profit greatly by the very low prices following a panic. They can by suddenly calling in and hoarding very large sums of cash bear prices exceedingly and even cause a general panic.

NORMAL SUPPLY AND DEMAND.

To comprehend panics and their remedy the question of demand and supply of currency should be considered. The normal supply of actual cash in bank in 1893 was about $450,000,000. It is now probably about $650,000,000, excluding cash items. The normal daily demand for the payment of current commercial indebtedness amounts to about twice the actual hard cash in all the banks, or exceeding $1,000,000,000 each day. The estimate is arrived at as follows: The clearings of the New York City banks for May were five and one-half billions. It was equally large for March and April. These clearings only include the checks held by each bank against its associate banks in the clearing house, and do not include the internal checks of these banks which are paid in cash or which transfer credits from one customer to another.

Estimating the activity of other depositors by the activity of the depositors in the associated banks of New York (New York banks having one-seventh of all the deposits), the total clearings would be seven times five and one-half billions, or thirty-eight and one-half billions monthly. If there were any excess in this estimate of external clearings it would be fairly counterbalanced by the vast volume of internal checks of the New York banks and of over 9,700 banks not in the clearing house of New York, whose chief business is in internal clearings or unrecorded external clearings, and the same character of business of probably exceeding a hundred thousand merchants and commission men and brokers who receive deposits and pay checks, but whose reserve cash is all in the banks on deposit. The estimate of $1,000,000,000 a day in checks is surely well within the actual facts. No full statistics are available, and this must be a matter only of conjecture. Nevertheless the suggested relation is sufficient to demonstrate that the normal daily demand is very large. One unacquainted with banking may say, How can a bank stand an issue of checks daily twice as great as its cash on hand? The answer is simple: These checks draw no money out of banks, but simply transfer book credits from one account to another—from A to B, from B to C, and from B and C to A, etc.—and usually require only about one dollar out of twenty in cash.

It is only when these checks draw out cash for hoarding that they become dangerous. A hundred thousand in cash drawn out for hoarding may shrink the total deposits $400,000 immediately. For example, $100,000 drawn out of Sherman, Tex., banks by frightened depositors for hoarding may be drawn by these banks from the Dallas reserve banks, who may draw upon their reserves in the St. Louis banks, who may draw upon their reserves in the New York reserve banks.

The $100,000 thus locked up by Sherman depositors diminishes the deposits of the New York banks $100,000 in actual cash; of the St. Louis banks, $100,000 in book-credit cash; of the Dallas banks, $100,000 in book-credit cash; of the Sherman banks, $100,000 in book-credit cash; but the St. Louis, Dallas, and Sherman banks each are short $100,000 in what they call their reserve cash, and the New York banks are $100,000 short in actual cash, and each is disturbed in that degree and communicates the feeling to others. If the depositors all over the country are alarmed and the withdrawals for hoarding run into the millions, then the alarm may become extreme and a panic ensue. The above exaggerated instance of $400,000 shrinkage in deposits by the withdrawal of $100,000 in cash is, of course, merely used to illustrate the principle that actual cash withdrawn seems to withdraw a larger sum and excites alarm the more. It has its converse view, and it will be observed that in such an instance $100,000 in cash would settle $400,000 of bank debts to depositors.

The normal supply for banking purposes at present is about $650,000,000. This is the total amount which 9,800 national banks, state banks, private banks, and loan and trust companies have been able to secure, using all their great influence to gather in all the available money of the communities in which they operate. They have from fifteen to eighteen million customers; they have all the wholesale and retail merchants, tradesmen, and shopkeepers of every description. Every retailer in the land, supplying every need of the people for food, clothing, furnishing, and articles of trade and industry, diligently collect every dollar of currency they can from the people and deposit it in banks continually.

The money which remains in the hands of the people is comparatively small and what they actually need for pocket money. It assuredly seems to be very little available as a supply to meet the demand in times of panic.

It is true that the Treasury Department reports about $1,700,000,000 in circulation. This venerable fiction has the prestige of past reports in its favor, but the estimate is certainly erroneous. What banker or business man in the United States is prepared to believe that the people have twice as much currency in their pockets as all of the banks—national and State, private and savings, trust company and mercantile world, with nearly every adult person in the United States on their books, and using all their influence to collect the money of the United States into the banks—have succeeded in obtaining? The banks of the country have probably three-fourths of all the money; certainly two-thirds. The daily checks on the banks are about twice as great as the cash in the bank, and as great as all the cash in the country, on the very liberal estimate that the banks have only one-half the cash. The error in the estimate of the Treasury Department is due to the following: They have made no deduction of paper money in notes large or small, lost or destroyed. It may have been lost by fire and flood, by accident, by design, by endless casualty. Even large sums of old bonds, which were of large denominations and which offered every inducement against carelessness, have disappeared and remain unpaid. Not only is silver and gold subject to the same accident and loss as paper money, but large quantities of silver and gold are used in the industrial arts for an indefinite number of purposes. The Mint reported, in 1892, having furnished for industrial use $16,644,953 in gold and $9,631,746 in silver, a total of $26,276,699 in one year. And yet the estimate of withdrawal of coin for such purposes is put at an annual sum of $1,600,000. The English estimate for the same is put at an average of $7,500,000 for about half as many people, and a people much more economical, for gold alone. There is no special occasion for persons wanting gold to go to the mints when the gold is in circulation and they can get it for industrial use by taking it from the circulation. Of course no record is made of such withdrawals, and it is difficult to determine what the amount actually is, but it is probably $15,000,000 a year in gold, or $150,000,000 in ten years.

Gold and silver are buried by misers; every dollar the Chinese get is said to be shipped to China, and their total earnings have been large. Gold and silver are shipped to Europe by multitudes of small persons for use there, and no account is kept of it except when the shipments happen to be very large. The large shipments from 1870 to 1896 made an excess export of gold of $618,835,551. The amount of gold which American tourists carry over in their pockets and never bring back is very considerable, probably amounting to millions annually. This leakage of our currency has been going on in degree since the foundation of our Government, and it must now have reached a vast sum, because, with a commercial system developed to a marvelous degree of efficiency, the total amount of visible money is less than one-third of the estimated supply. The visible gold and silver in the national banks of the United States July 14, 1898, was $284,921,337 of gold, $44,421,601 of silver, or a total of $329,342,938, and the other banks about one-half as much, or $160,000,000—less than $500,000,000 out of $1,302,000,000 estimated among the people. The estimate of the United States Mint—which is extravagant if the estimate of the United States is a sample—puts the world's stock at $4,359,600,000 gold (1897) and $4,268,300,000 silver.

It is manifest that this stock is only about twenty years' issue of the mines at their present output. What has become of the output of the mines of ages past of these treasured metals? Alexander the Great coined gold and silver three hundred years before Christ, and robbed Persia of over $400,000,000 in gold and silver, and men have been digging gold and silver ever since. Where is it all?

It has been used for ornaments, for coin, for the industrial arts; it has been reduced to dust by abrasion; it has been lost; it has been buried or sunk in the sea, and only about twenty years' output remains in circulation on the most extravagant estimates. All the gold reported by the great European banks does not exceed $1,500,000,000 and the silver $500,000,000, about the amount of checks drawn in two days in the United States. Modern commerce has grown so greatly in the United States that the need of the people for money to pay their daily business obligations, as exhibited by their checks, is twice all the gold and silver in the banks and nearly twice all of the cash the banks actually have.

The property of the United States is, on a low estimate, worth $80,000,000,000. The bank deposits are about 8 per cent of this sum. The cash in bank is about three-fourths of 1 per cent of this sum. The annual expenditure and revenue of the Government is about equal to the total cash held by the entire banking system. If the Government were to withdraw from circulation money equal to one year's revenue, universal bankruptcy must ensue. Who is so bold as to assert that the visible assets are not great enough to afford security to any reasonable amount of currency which the people of the United States should authorize? What thoughtful man can say to his own conscience that there is no need for enlarging this currency? The necessity for expanding the currency is now very generally recognized. It should be remembered, however, that enlarging the currency will not prevent panics, for the reason that no reasonable expansion will substantially change the ratio between deposits and cash, and the danger of violent shrinkage in bank cash by hoarding of depositors.

Remedial legislation should not only expand the currency, but the menace to the banks of a class of timid depositors who hoard in time of panic should be removed, and a means of quick expansion of currency which shall be self-contracting should be provided.

The Comptroller of the Currency estimates (1896) that of business transactions six-tenths of 1 per cent was by gold, five-tenths of 1 per cent was by silver, 6.3 per cent was by currency, and 92.5 per cent was by check. So that on the estimate of a billion dollars daily of banking business $75,000,000 would be in notes, six millions in gold, and five millions in silver. If half the ordinary checks were for hoarding, it would close the banks in one day. But in point of fact none of these checks are for hoarding in normal times. It is safer to keep money in bank than in private trunks "where moth and rust doth corrupt and thieves do break through and steal." But there is a class of timid depositors holding inactive accounts, which constitutes the greatest menace to banks, because when rumors begin to fly these people are the first to rush in and draw out and hoard currency, and thus they specially precipitate a panic. So dangerous and offensive is this action that sensible banks would gladly refuse the deposits of such people. This element is difficult to locate and diagnose, and is dangerous to the stability of the banking reserve and therefore to the stability of commercial life, and it ought to be withdrawn from the banks and provided for in postal savings banks as it is done in almost every civilized country in Europe. For example, in England, in Germany, in France, in Holland, in Belgium, in Denmark, in Norway and Sweden, in Switzerland, in Italy, etc., this class is provided for by postal savings banks conducted by the Government. The Government is the only banker of which this class has no fear.

By giving these depositors in the United States postal savings banks a bond of low denomination, bearing a low rate and having a term with abundant time option of redemption to the Government, the United States would never be embarrassed by their redemption. By making these bonds issued in small denominations domestic legal tender they would serve as an auxiliary in times of money stringency, and instead of a timid depositor being a source of weakness to the financial and commercial stability of the country he would become a source of strength.

It will be observed from the above remarks that the deposits of the banks are turned over on an average of once every six days, and that the actual cash is turned over in cash transactions about once in every seven. This appears to be the normal condition.

People put money in bank because they wish to have it subject to instant demand. They sacrifice the interest of investment in order to have ready money. Failure to get it on the instant of need might be ruinous. When public confidence is greatly disturbed and the reserve begins to shrink the instinct of self-preservation in all the creditor class is excited. Nearly every business man is a creditor, and also a debtor. As creditor his impulse is to push all his debtor neighbors, and as a debtor he is pushed by all his creditor neighbors. The debts paid are normally a billion dollars daily. Settlements are generally made on an average of thirty days, and the current indebtedness between business people will probably reach thirty billions. This money is needed. In thirty days all could be supplied in the normal exchange of checks, but the alarm of panic makes men press each other unduly and withhold payment unwisely, and thus the senseless alarm rises to dangerous proportions and active and ruinous hoarding begins.

The normal demand, which in ordinary times is distributed uniformly through some months, in times of panic is concentrated to a much shorter time, so that the demand heavily increases and excites alarm, and alarm locks up the currency which the banks are obliged to have in order to carry on business. The $1,000,000,000 of checks which serve as a species of currency goes through a violent shrinkage because they are no longer willingly received, thus having the effect of a further violent contraction of currency. The exchanges shrunk over 50 per cent in the panics of 1873 and 1884, and nearly 50 per cent in the panic of 1893. The factor by which all others become insignificant in comparison, which causes injury and is the soul of the panic, is hoarding. It is true hoarding springs from alarm, and the excessive demand springs from alarm, but alarm and its excessive demand would soon abate if there were an abundant supply of money. The shrinkage of deposits in national banks alone was $128,000,000 from June to December, 1873, $135,000,000 from April to June, 1884, and $378,000,000 from May to October, 1893—less than half the total withdrawals of deposits by the depositors of all the banks.

It is the absence of money due to hoarding that does the evil, causing violent disturbance to commercial life and great fluctuation in prices, ruining substantial houses and putting banks in undeserved liquidation. The alarm which leads to hoarding is brought about by business men pressing each other too severely, the banks meantime being quite as guilty as others in pressing the weakest men to settlement and refusing loans on good security. The Bank of England pursues the exact contrary course, and when Overend, Guerney & Co. failed they loaned out in one week $50,000,000, to the exhaustion of its reserve. The Bank of France and the Imperial Bank of Germany are armed against this situation, and under their laws they can extend every reasonable accommodation to every solvent debtor. The banks of the United States have no concert of action and dare not do so severally, although by unity they might.

It is therefore evident that if the currency withdrawn by hoarding could be supplemented by special issue of currency based on proper security, the panic would instantly cease, the alarm would stop, the artificial demand due to excitement disappear, and the reasonable demands of normal business could be supplied. This is precisely the remedy which the Bank of England evolved out of a series of disastrous panics, to wit, the right to issue and the actual issue of legal-tender notes against securities in her hands in time of panic.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

The Bank of England avoids panics by the following method:

This bank holds the ultimate reserve of all the banks of the United Kingdom. The reserve constitutes the only available cash reserve against $3,500,000,000 in deposits. This reserve amounts to a sum ranging from $130,000,000 to $150,000,000, or about 4 per cent of the deposits net. The Bank of England has a great advantage in having all the reserve concentrated in the hand of one concern, charged with the duty (by the force of public opinion) of maintaining this reserve above the danger point.

First. The instant this reserve begins to diminish by gold export the Bank of England raises the rate of interest. This tends to check gold exports, to cause gold imports, and usually brings idle gold from the continent. If, in ordinary times, gold is not attracted it is usually because there is loanable money on Lombard street content with a lower rate. In this event the Bank of England sells consols for cash and buys them back on time, which has the effect of absorbing the loanable money on the street and thus making the rate effective in attracting gold.

Second. When local credit is violently disturbed, and for that reason the rate might not attract idle capital held by European bankers, the Bank of England borrows gold directly, as it did from the Bank of France when the Baring liquidation was anticipated.

Third. The Bank of England when panic threatens lends with great freedom to all legitimate borrowers, so as to relieve the pressure and relieve alarm as far as possible. For example: When Overend, Gurney & Co. failed in 1866, the Bank of England loaned in one day $20,000,000 and in one week $50,000,000, to the depletion of the cash in the banking department.

Fourth. When the cash is about exhausted in the banking department and the closing of the bank becomes imminent, the administrative government of Great Britain has always, through the prime minister, by letter, advised the Bank of England to issue notes (legal-tender money) against other securities than gold (to which the excess issue was confined by the act of 1844). This was done in 1847, in 1857, and in 1866, with the result that the panic in each case was controlled instantly.

The method of the Bank of England in raising the rate and borrowing gold is not adaptable to the United States for the reason that the element of time and distance and absence of concentration are substantial barriers to such devices; but the issue of notes against proper securities can be made easily applicable to the United States by an act authorizing the United States Treasury to issue Treasury notes against proper security deposited by the banks in times of stringency, with adequate provision for retiring such notes when the panic was over.

THE BANK OF GERMANY.

The Imperial Bank of Germany is substantially a state institution. The state gets all the benefit over and above a low rate of interest to the stockholders. The bank is controlled and dominated by the uniform rate of interest. It has substantially a monopoly in the issue of paper money. It carries in its vaults a large amount of gold and silver, averaging $200,000,000 in gold and silver, principally gold. It is protected against panic, and Germany is protected against panic, and the commercial stability of the German Empire secured by giving this bank the right to issue currency not only against gold, but also against the securities held by the Imperial Bank, consisting of bills, due within ninety days or less, and secured generally by three and at least by two persons known to be solvent. It may issue even in excess of these limitations by paying a tax to the German Empire of 5 per cent per annum on such overissue. The result is that a panic in Germany is impossible, that the normal rate of interest is between 3 and 4 per cent, commercial stability is secured, and their enterprises and manufactures are making themselves felt throughout the civilized world.

The store of gold held by the Imperial Bank of Germany is protected as in England—

First. By raising the rate.

Second. By favorable assay to foreign gold, by giving six to eight interest days to shippers, and other little devices favoring the shipment of gold to Berlin.

Third. The powerful influence of the bank is exerted on the bankers of Berlin to prevent their shipping gold, which is generally effective.

Fourth. While the bank does not refuse to pay gold on demand, persons asking for gold for shipment feel that when the bank says "yes" it really means "no."

The only features of the German legislation apparently available in the United States is issuing currency against securities and issuing emergency currency under the penalty of a tax. Either one of which would appear sufficient to protect the United States from panic, and both of which should be adopted.

THE BANK OF FRANCE.

The Bank of France, which is practically under state control, carries the largest gold and silver reserve in Europe. Its gold was, October 13, 1898, $369,000,000; its silver was $246,000,000, making a total of $615,000,000.

The duty of the governor of this bank is to watch that "the bank performs its duty to the state and toward the commerce and industry of the country." The banks of the United States owe a duty to the State and toward the commerce and industry of the country which the law should enable and require them to perform.

This bank is protected against panic by the authority under the law of 1897 to issue legal-tender notes to the amount of $1,000,000,000, of which it has issued $739,000,000.

It hoards its gold and silver not by raising the rate, but by other devices. First, in case of an exchange unfavorable to France, the Bank of France pays out small gold coins which by use are slightly under weight and therefore not suitable for export. In case of strong demand, money brokers buy up full-weight napoleons and sell them for export, and ultimately the bank feels the withdrawal, but it costs something to take gold from France in this manner and the method opposes a mechanical obstruction to the withdrawal of gold. Second, if a request is made of the Bank of France for a large amount of gold for export the request must be submitted to the directors, who impose a charge just at a point which is usually prohibitive. Third, in case of need the Bank of France can protect its gold hoard by paying out 5-franc silver pieces as legal tender under the law, and this provision of course abundantly protects the gold held by the bank against direct withdrawal.

There is a vast difference between the business methods of France and the business methods of the United States. The French people by long custom still maintain and do nearly all their business in cash, and checks are comparatively little used in commercial life. The consequence is that the people have acquired and use a very large amount of currency in gold and silver, including $739,000,000 in notes of the Bank of France.

The Bank of France not being compelled to pay gold on demand, though it does do so for domestic purposes, does not need to raise the rate of interest to protect its gold. For this reason, while the bank rate from February, 1889, to October, 1897, was raised by the Bank of England fifty-three times and by the Imperial Bank of Germany twenty-six times, it was only raised by the Bank of France once. It is the policy of the Bank of France to let the French people have money at the unvarying rate of 3 per cent, believing that stability in the rate of interest gives stability to commercial enterprise and promotes the welfare of the "commerce and industry of the country," which is a chief duty of the bank.

The very large surplus in coin of the Bank of France prevents the loss of confidence which leads to panic, and the bank has so large a margin of note issue, with disposition to extend every reasonable demand, and France itself has so large a supply of internal currency in circulation, and the banking deposits being relatively small, that there is no danger there of panic in times of peace.

THE BANK OF CANADA.

Even the banks of our nearest neighbor, the Dominion of Canada, have a method which expands and contracts the circulation as much as 20 per cent during the three months in each year when the crops of forest and field are moving.

Their notes may be issued to the extent of their unimpaired capital paid up.

The notes form a prior lien on the assets and are secured by a 5 per cent guaranty fund. The notes must be redeemed at any part of the Dominion. No reserve is actually required by law, but the cash reserve for redemption has actually averaged in gold and legal tenders for some years 10 per cent about. Under the law 40 per cent of the reserves must be in Dominion legal tenders, which, of course, take care of such paper to that extent. There is a double liability of stockholders, a special liability of directors, elaborate regulations, frequent printed reports, etc. The striking feature is that in the history of these banks the guaranty fund of 5 per cent for the security of their notes has never been depleted, and that this method offers a method which the United States might safely use for expanding the currency.

THE REMEDY IN THE UNITED STATES.

The remedy for panics in the United States which suggests itself is:

First. Established postal savings banks in which "timid" depositors with inactive accounts may place their money, because at present by sudden hoarding in times of excitement they constitute the greatest danger to the stability of banks and therefore to the stability of commerce.

Second. Issue to such depositors in the postal savings banks, in lieu of their deposits, a bond, of long term, with liberal option as to period of redemption by the Government, bearing a low rate and issued in small denominations, available for currency, and make such bonds legal tender. In this way such deposits would become a source of strength instead of weakness.

Third. Authorize the Treasury of the United States to issue Treasury notes to banks depositing bonds of a fixed character, Federal, State, or municipal, where the standing of such bonds is thoroughly assured, leaving the determination of their character with the Secretary of the Treasury. In this case a charge should be made against the banks drawing the notes by a tax in excess of the amount of interest borne by such bonds, so as to secure the prompt redemption and repayment of the advances.

APPENDIX B.

[Kansas City Times, July 5, 1899.]

TO PREVENT PERIODIC PANICS—PLAN FOR EXPANDING THE CURRENCY DURING A FINANCIAL CRISIS—HON. ROBERT L. OWEN SUGGESTS THE ISSUE OF TREASURY NOTES AGAINST STANDARD SECURITIES IN TIMES OF PANIC, BY WHICH THE BANKS WOULD AVOID THE FORCING OF BORROWERS INTO LIQUIDATION.

To the Editor of the Kansas City Times:

The panic of 1893 is instructive. At that time, on March 6, 1893 (see report of Comptroller of Currency, 1893, vol. 1, p. 623), the deposits subject to withdrawal on check of 3,806 national banks was $2,235,000,000. On October 3 this deposit had fallen to $1,814,000,000, a withdrawal of $421,000,000 within a few months. The total amount of cash which the national banks held on March 6, 1893, was $312,000,000, so that they were required to relinquish in deposits over $100,000,000 in cash in excess of what cash they had. This is a remarkable spectacle. The withdrawal of deposits thus amounted to over 18 per cent of the total deposit. The total deposit in the United States at that time, to wit, in 3,806 national banks (p. 646), 3,759 State banks (p. 623), 1,025 savings banks (p. 605), 904 private banks (p. 606), 224 trust companies (p. 604), amounted to $5,338,000,000 of deposits. The total amount of cash, and this includes all cash items of the State banks, savings banks, private banks, and trust companies, whose reports do not separate cash and cash items, was $533,000,000. It should be clearly remembered that cash items are by no manner of means cash, but only checks in transit, and a very different thing from money, because in time of panic they are not available. The deposits more than ten times exceed the amount of actual cash held by all the banking institutions in the United States. This ratio is of extreme significance.

We have shown above that exceeding 18 per cent of the deposits of the national banks was required of them between March and October of 1893. The ratio which cash items and clearing-house exchanges bear to the actual currency is large, particularly in the great cities. For example, in the city of Boston (see p. 754), on September 20, 1898, the cash items and clearing-house exchanges amounted to $13,000,000, while the currency amounted to $24,000,000. These clearing-house exchanges must be regarded as an artificial form of money serving a valuable purpose and having a brief life individually, but long life collectively.

The clearing-house exchanges and cash items in New York City on September 20, 1898, including cash items, amounted to $64,000,000, while the total cash amounted to $152,000,000; the clearing-house exchange was an artificial money equal to about 40 per cent of the actual currency they had on hand and served a valuable purpose in the banking business and commercial life, yet it is not cash, nor is it available for the purpose of paying a depositor who calls for his money. When the depositors call for more money than the banks have on hand, as they did do in 1893 in New York, the banks were compelled to decline to pay the cash and to insist upon putting in circulation the clearing-house certificates, which they did to the extent of many millions, manufacturing an artificial currency in violation of the laws of the United States and earning the gratitude of the entire country by their illegal action. It is a singular situation when the laws of the United States are in such a condition that the entire commercial world rises up and bestows its blessing on the New York clearing house for violating the statutes.

In the estimates of $533,000,000 of cash the Comptroller's report for the State banks, savings banks, private banks, and trust companies makes no distinctions between cash and cash items, consequently they are necessarily merged in the estimate, of which they constitute two-fifths, so that in 1893 there must have been something less than $500,000,000 currency or actual cash, including specie, Treasury notes, bank notes, and all forms of paper, silver, and gold which may be classed as money.

It is a wonderful thing if it be true, and it is not true, if the people of the United States in 1893 had a total money in circulation of $1,596,000,000, and all of the banks in the United States combined had less than one-third of that money. On this theory the people keep twice as much money at their homes as they do in the banks and savings and trust companies. The per capita circulation in 1893 was represented to be $23.85, and on this basis the average person should have had $8 in the bank and $16 in his pocket; every family of five should have had $80 at home and $40 in the bank. The commonest observer is aware that this is preposterous; very few people keep money at their homes, and the probable average circulation in the western country, with which the writer is familiar, of the average dweller in town and village and country would probably not exceed $5 to the household, or $1 per capita. In the city doubtless it is greater, and even if it should be three times greater it would still leave in the hands of the people only an average circulation of $3 per capita. From the reliable reports of the Comptroller of the Currency it is manifest that in 1893 (see page 364) the 66,000,000 of people in the United States had less than $500,000,000 in banks in cash, or a per capita of less than $7.50—that is, in sight. We are told, however, by the statistician of the Treasury Department (page 364) that the people had at that time $23.85 per capita circulation. This venerable and hoary fiction has the sanction of past reports in its favor. It is based upon the presumption that no coin of the United States in silver or gold which has ever been issued was ever used for commercial purposes; none of it is supposed ever to have been melted up for gilding or in jewelry or in the mechanic arts; none of it has ever been lost by fire or flood, at home or on the seas; not a dollar of the paper money which has ever been issued has ever been burnt up, has ever been worn to tatters and not redeemed, has ever been lost or destroyed by accident or intention.

It is the custom of business houses desiring to keep their affairs in a healthy condition to take an annual inventory of stock and charge to profit and loss that which is injured, impaired, or destroyed, and if it can not be estimated with precision an intelligent and conservative estimate is made and the deduction made accordingly. The United States Treasury has never made an estimate to cover this loss referred to, until the fiction of the per capita circulation in the United States has become so gross that it deceives no intelligent man.

Who is capable of believing that 3,806 national banks, 3,579 State banks, 1,025 savings banks, and 904 private banks, 224 trust companies, or 9,538 banking institutions, devoting all of their energies to securing the deposits of every available dollar in the community where they do business, and having the absolute confidence of the people everywhere, should be unable to get exceeding $7.50 per capita, or less than one-third of the money in the hands of the people? This statement is perfectly preposterous. The banks and banking institutions of the country have nearly every dollar in the community; they must have three-fourths of it all, and there can not be exceeding $10 per capita in the United States, or if this be deemed an excessive estimate, assuredly they would be credited with having at least one-half, and this leaves $15 per capita. The banks in 1893 had in cash a total of less than $500,000,000. They had a total line of deposits exceeding $5,338,000,000. The people drew out exceeding 18 per cent, or probably about $960,000,000. There was but one way for the banks to meet this withdrawal. It was to take those who were their weakest borrowers and earnestly and zealously force them to settlement at a time when the banks themselves were not able to accommodate the borrowers—at a time when the borrower who was weakest was compelled to sacrifice his property and throw it on the market. He had no escape from liquidation. Commercial lives by the thousand were destroyed in the panic of 1893. A shrinkage of values took place throughout the United States; probably 25 per cent would be a reasonable estimate upon the total property values in the Union. The property of the United States, estimated at $100,000,000,000, a shrinkage of $25,000,000,000, resulted because of a withdrawal of some $900,000,000 of deposits by the depositors of the United States when they had been sufficiently alarmed by the metropolitan press and by the acts of the New York clearing house.

You will remember that the New York clearing house, through its committee of nine, caused the New York banks to issue a circular to the banks of the South and West, and perhaps elsewhere, advising them that the agitation of silver was disturbing the confidence of the country, and that they would not be able to extend the accommodations previously afforded to the South and West until the Sherman purchasing act was repealed and confidence restored. That circular had considerable effect, which culminated when, in June, 1893, the banks combined to call all call loans. This action threw on the market immense blocks of securities, which were necessarily sacrificed, and which alarmed the whole country extremely. Preceding this financial tragedy the country was full of rumors of impending panic. Confidence having been destroyed in this manner, deposits went out with a rush. Thousands of boxes in safety-deposit vaults were engaged in which to lock up currency. No way had been provided by the Government for expanding the currency to meet a withdrawal of this character. The consequence was that the panic, with its enormous destruction of commercial life, the shrinkage of property values, and the great evils with which the country is familiar necessarily followed. The property values of the United States on the present gold basis may be fairly estimated at $100,000,000,000. The people of the United States carry in deposits exceeding 5 per cent of this sum; the banks of the United States had less than one-half of 1 per cent of this sum in currency in 1893, and the ratio has not greatly changed since.

It is perfectly manifest that the currency could be quickly and safely expanded by issuing Treasury notes against standard securities put up as collateral with the Treasury of the United States. In this manner the sudden withdrawal of deposits and the shrinkage of the narrow margin of currency available to the banks could be supplemented as above stated, without forcing into liquidation at such an unfortunate time any borrower. An issue of this kind could be made under proper safeguards with a sliding scale of interest against the party drawing Treasury notes on such collateral and the redemption of such securities promptly secured when the Government desired it. These Treasury notes could be designated as domestic currency, made legal tender, and their withdrawal left to the option of the Government. There is no doubt whatever that the people of the United States in time of panic would be glad to get such notes; not the slightest fear need be entertained that they would be discounted because of the Government retaining the option of their withdrawal. The withdrawal of deposits in the panic of 1893 was over in less than six months, and the actual currency held by the banks during that period was increased above the normal, so that, judging the future by the past, such an issue of notes would not be needed for a period exceeding six months.

The fact is that when the people know that a good and sufficient means for avoiding a panic has been provided the fear which inspires them, and by which means they are induced to withdraw their deposits, will cease and the cause of the panic be removed. No man knowing that there is a means of escape will be alarmed. Fear alone creates a panic. The ingenious system of drafts and checks and cash items and clearing-house exchanges and acceptances make the currency we have exceedingly fluent, so that the people could carry on their commercial life without interruption if they were protected from the fear of panics. The reason a man withdraws his money from the bank is because he fears that the bank is no longer safe. He hears talk of panic. He sees in the metropolitan press daily reports about the gold in the Treasury of the United States going to Europe; that the gold reserve is falling below the danger point; that it is less than $100,000,000; that it is $96,000,000; that it is $92,000,000; that it is $88,000,000; that it is $84,000,000; that it is $78,000,000; that the gold is going away, and he infers that our Government is in a tottering condition. Those who desire the Government to issue bonds assist in alarming the country for the purpose of justifying the Executive in his own mind and in the opinion of the people in issuing bonds for the purpose of protecting the Federal Treasury. But while they are doing this they are laying the foundation of a panic, and since it takes only 10 per cent of the withdrawal of deposits to consume all of the cash the banks have on hand, it is not difficult to alarm the banks, and each banker in the country, when sufficiently alarmed, quietly and calmly and conscientiously takes his weakest debtor by the throat and pushes him firmly and judiciously to the wall at a time when he can not possibly borrow from any other bank. It is a very good plan to destroy the American citizen at the weakest point and take away hope and light and life from the class of men who need gentler and fairer treatment.

Their destruction vigorously reacts upon the body politic and diminishes the power and the strength and the glory of our Government. Every little captain of industry who is thus strangled has a little company behind him to whom he gives employment, and the destruction of one man grinds the face of many. It means hard suffering and despair to many an honest fellow who is anxious to work and to do his full share in the life of an industrious and active citizenship.

It is the duty of the United States to provide a means by which periodic panics which shake the American Republic and do it enormous injury shall be stopped. They are easy to prevent. The remedy is perfectly simple. Provide a means for quickly expanding the currency when financial fear threatens the country. Provide a means by which the timid depositor who rushes on the banker and demands his money shall not frighten that banker out of his wits. Provide a means by which that banker can, upon the strength of adequate security, obtain a temporary accommodation of money with which to meet his frightened depositors. In a time of panic a man can not borrow money if he puts up gold dollars as collateral for the manifest reason that it is not security, but currency, which is then required. The banker has not the currency to lend, and he can not lend that which he has not, no matter what the security. You can not then borrow on Government bonds if you put up $10,000 for $1,000. It is the duty of the United States to protect the commercial life of its citizens against this senseless, unreasoning, destructive fear that seizes the depositor when he has been sufficiently hypnotized by the metropolitan press with indiscreet suggestions.

An important auxiliary to the remedy proposed would be to establish postal savings banks in which the cowardly depositor could place his money and in this way remove from the banks that class of depositors who are dangerous. The timid depositor is not very likely to be afraid of the Government, while at times he may become distrustful of his local banker. Such postal savings could by proper means be utilized as a basis for quick expansion of the currency by issuing notes against them or converting them into legal tender in times of threatened panic.

APPENDIX C.

[From The Morning World, January 7, 1908.]

WALL STREET—WORST OF GAMBLING PLACES.

Governor Hughes in his message recommends the abolition of race-track gambling. He asks the legislature to make bookmaking at race tracks a prison offense, like pool selling. His authority for this recommendation is section 9 of article 1 of the constitution of the State of New York, which requires that "the legislature shall pass appropriate laws to prevent" any form of gambling within this State.

This section of the constitution should be enforced everywhere with equal justice.

Nowhere is its enforcement more needed than in the New York Stock Exchange, the Consolidated Stock Exchange, the Cotton Exchange, and on the Broad street curb. Race-track gambling at its worst is an evil of petty consequences in comparison with Wall street gambling. Race-track gambling injures only those who bet on horses. Wall street gambling maw menace the legitimate business of the entire nation.

What other public service could Governor Hughes render comparable with the elimination, segregation, or even restriction of this great evil?

BANKS AS GAMBLING TOOLS.

In no other country than the United States are incorporated banks part of the machinery of stock gambling. In no other country are the methods of stock gamblers such as to require the constant use for that sole purpose of hundreds of millions of dollars of other people's money. In no other country is the National Treasury called upon to turn over the public revenues for the use of members of a stock exchange. In London, Paris, Berlin, Frankfort, and Amsterdam gamblers in stock must use their own money and their own credit as if they were playing at Monte Carlo instead of on a stock exchange.

This difference in stock-gambling accounts for the great fluctuations in the rates of interest in New York as compared with the stability of European financial centers. In New York call money may be 3 per cent one day and 50 per cent the next day, something unknown in Europe.

The banking laws and the banking system of the United States concentrate the fluid capital of the country in Wall street. By bidding up the rate of interest higher than legitimate business can pay, stock gamblers are able to draw from productive industry its means for supplying payrolls, for carrying on manufacturing, for distributing goods, and for moving the crops.

To-day, for instance, the World's Wall street article bears the head "Flood of Cash Buoys Stock List." The money came from every part of the country—from many places where the business need of it is sore.

In Great Britain an increase of 1 per cent in the discount rate of the Bank of England is regarded as a serious fluctuation. For the Bank of France to alter its rate one-half of 1 per cent is a matter of international finance. For the Bank of Germany to change a third of last week's highest rate in Wall street is done only after serious consultation with the Government, with great capitalists, and with business interests.

THE WORLD'S BIGGEST GAMBLING HOUSE.

Nowhere on the earth does another such gambling institution exist as finds shelter in the New York Stock Exchange—an unincorporated, irresponsible institution. According to the statistics carefully compiled by James Creelman in Pearson's Magazine there were sold in 1906 on the stock exchange 286,418,601 shares of stock of the par value of $25,000,000,000, besides 665,000 thousand-dollar bonds; on the consolidated exchange 136,000,760 shares of stock, besides 21,569,178 shares of mining stock and 193,884,000 bushels of wheat. This does not include curb sales.

These gambling transactions amount to over $30,000,000,000—four times the value of the products of all the farms of the United States, half the value of all the land and buildings, one-third the census valuation of all the wealth of every kind in the country.

Last year there were sold on the stock exchange 43,399,710 shares of Reading, fifteen times the total amount of Reading stock in existence. Of the Union Pacific, Harriman's road, there were sold 36,751,600 shares, twenty times as much as existed.

Ninety-nine and one-half per cent of these transactions, according to Thomas W. Lawson, are nothing except bets that the price goes up or down. They are as much gambling as betting on a horse race or on the card that comes out of the faro box or on the odd or even fall of the dice.

THE BUCKET-SHOP LAW.

Under section 343 of the Penal Code it is a crime for—

"Any building * * * to be used for * * * making any wagers or bets made to depend upon the future price of stocks, bonds, securities, commodities or property of any description whatever."

This law was passed to enable the stock exchange to close bucket shops and thus monopolize gambling in stocks. For this purpose the law is effective, because the bucket shop makes no pretense to actual delivery of the stocks in which it gambles, while the stock exchange does. The system of the stock exchange to evade the gambling law and to utilize for its own purposes the fluid capital of the United States is complicated. Were it simple and known to everybody it would long since have been abolished.

THREE BILLIONS OF MONEY.

Without banking facilities and credit, productive industry would be limited to the use of real money as the method of exchange. Business would become largely barter, because 95 per cent of the business of the country is done with checks. All the gold and silver of the world would not suffice to sustain a cash basis. The total amount of money in the United States, including gold, silver, legal-tender greenbacks and national-bank notes, is only $3,000,000,000, while the exchanges of the New York Clearing-House alone amounted in 1906 to $103,754,100,091, or thirty times the amount of all the money in the United States.

Of this money the United States Treasury holds a little over a third to cover its gold and silver certificates, as a reserve against its legal-tender notes, for the redemption account of national-bank notes and as a cash balance. Another third is held by the banks and trust companies as a reserve on their deposits. That leaves less than $1,000,000,000 for circulation.

THIRTEEN BILLION DEPOSITS.

The deposits of banks and trust companies other than private and national banks amount to $8,000,000,000. The deposits of the 6,625 national banks of the United States as reported on December 3 amount in round figures to $5,000,000,000. All the money in the United States would not pay one-quarter of these deposits on demand.

THE RESERVE SYSTEM.

To protect the depositors and to prevent the undue inflation of credit the national banking law, of which the State banking law is substantially a copy, provides that banks "must retain a reserve of lawful money." Three cities—New York, Chicago, and St. Louis—are made central reserve cities, where banks must keep on hand in cash 25 per cent. of the'r deposits. Banks in twenty-eight other reserve cities must also keep 25 per cent reserve, but only one-half of this need be in cash in their vaults, the other half being allowed to be deposited in New York, Chicago, or St. Louis banks. In all other cities and towns the banks must maintain a reserve of 15 per cent, of which they need keep on hand only two-fifths, being allowed to deposit the other three-fifths in reserve banks.

This system drains the reserve money of the United States to Wall street. A commercial bank, charging merchants and manufacturers 6 per cent interest, can not afford to pay interest on deposits in competition with the Wall street banks, which can frequently get 20 to 50 per cent on the stock exchange for the use of their deposits. Thus these reserve moneys gravitate to the banks which can afford to pay high interest on them. This process of drawing the surplus savings of the country to Wall street was facilitated by the three great insurance companies—the Equitable, Mutual, and New York Life—which collected annually $200,000,000 from their policy holders. This money they either invested in Wall street securities or deposited in Wall street banks, making their disbursements by New York drafts and keeping the cash here.

Wall street thus became a great funnel into which the savings of the people, instead of being available to the local manufacturer or the local storekeeper, were driven by higher rates of interest to the stock exchange.

The system of reserves directly invited this. If a national bank in Altoona or Columbus or Topeka deposited its money in a Wall street bank it not only received interest but it was allowed to credit what the New York bank owed it to its legal reserve like real cash. But the debt of any country bank to a New York bank could not be credited to its legal reserve. A New York credit was legally cash and a country credit was not.

DEPOSITS AND LOANS.

When the recent panic became acute in November the clearing-house banks reported deposits of over $1,000,000,000. Of these deposits one-half were due to other banks. Of the loans, which slightly exceeded the deposits, over half were on stock exchange collateral. That is, the money collected from millions of depositors throughout the country by their local banks was used as the basis of Wall street credit and was the real money in the stock exchange game.

There are two general classes of loans. One is commercial paper—that is, discounts on bills of lading, on cotton, wheat, warehouse receipts, goods in manufacture, and the notes which retailers give their wholesalers and wholesalers give to their manufacturers. The other kind of loan is what Europe calls a finance bill and Wall street calls a collateral loan. It is a loan not on separable property, but on a piece of paper which represents an interest in indivisible property.

A share of railroad stock differs from a warehouse receipt for eggs, butter, cotton, or wheat, in that no holder of it can demand so many rails and ties or locomotives and cars. No holder of United States Steel stock can demand so many tons of steel rails or iron pigs; no holder of Standard Oil stock can demand so many barrels of kerosene. Neither can the holder of any corporate bond demand anything except payment of principal and interest when due, and bonds run for such long periods that their payment is an asset too slow to be realized on in an emergency.

This distinction is recognized in every other country. The Bank of France last November declined to make any advances on American finance bills, while expressing its willingness to loan all the money that their value would warrant on cotton, wheat, corn, and other tangible goods in shipment. The Bank of England months ago not only refused to discount American finance bills itself, but notified its customers that they must not do so. The Bank of Germany was forced several years ago to adopt the same policy.

In these countries the discounting of finance bills is left to private bankers, who use their own resources without involving general banking facilities, which are restricted to the use of commerce, manufacture, and other business.

COMMERCIAL OR FINANCE.

Instead of the New York national banks following this wise policy of the great European banks by looking after their commercial customers rather than seeking for the higher rates of interest which stock gamblers pay, they have adopted the contrary policy. In ten years, from 1896 to 1906, the New York bank loans on stock exchange collateral increased from $162,361,654 to $442,210,765. The gain in commercial loans was only two-fifths as much, $151,795,029 to $259,340,272.

During the panic weeks bank loans on collateral were actually increased. Banks had the alternative of carrying their stock-gambling customers or of such a stock exchange crash as would imperil their own solvency. Therefore some of the banks stopped commercial discounts and cut down the credit of solvent merchants in order to use all their resources to protect their brokers' collateral. It will be recalled that interest rates ran up to 200 per cent one afternoon, and that only the $25,000,000 which Mr. Morgan secured from the United States Treasury and dumped at once into the stock exchange prevented the immediate failure of gamblers who had bet that stocks would go up.

The system of stock gambling in Wall street is different from that banks increased their total loans over $100,000,000, yet at the same time they actually reduced their commercial loans.

THE MACHINERY OF GAMBLING.

The system of stock gambling in Wall street is different from that in any European country. Here every day the broker goes through the farce of legitimate purchase and sale. After one broker has bought and another sold, each makes a memorandum and the transaction is sent out through the ticker everywhere. Then each broker tabulates his transactions and sends to the stock exchange clearing house a copy, with a check for the difference between his price and the closing price. The clearing house sends out notices to the brokers telling them who is to deliver what shares of stock and to whom.

The next morning every broker who is to receive stocks sends to his bank and gets certified checks for the sums he is to pay. Part of the money he had already arranged for through the system of time and call loans on stock exchange collateral. For the rest his bank allows him to overdraw his balance, commonly overcertifying therefor. Then before 2.15 p. m. every broker who is to deliver stocks sends around the certificates and receives these certified checks. After 2.15 p. m., and before the banks close, every broker in turn deposits the certified checks and the stocks which he has received in his bank to make good the overdraft the bank certified for him in the morning.

HOW IT IS DONE ABROAD.

Without the banks' assistance this whole system would be destroyed and the stock gamblers in New York would have to gamble, as do the stock gamblers in London, Paris, and Frankfort, where this form of actual delivery in speculative transactions is not gone through with. Instead, there are fortnightly settlements, where the losers pay and the winners collect their winnings. Such a thing as a London stockbroker having the Bank of England or a Paris broker the Bank of France certify his check in advance and thus furnish the funds for him to gamble with is unheard of. The European stockbrokers gamble as do the London race-track bookmakers, who have their regular settlement day at Tattersalls.

On the London Stock Exchange settlements are made twice a month. On the Paris Bourse settlements are made once or twice a month. On the Frankfort Bourse there are semimonthly settlements. On the Berlin Bourse there are settlements at times fixed by the Government regulation. If the parties desire to continue the gamble a charge is made for an extension, but either party can quit the game and cash in at any time, just as in any other gambling house.

On the Continent these matters are regulated by the government so that general industry will no more be interfered with by stock gambling than by gambling at cards or dice. The Prussian Government forbids the short selling of industrial stocks on the Berlin Bourse. Transactions on margins are forbidden except in certain cases between registered parties. Unless a man registers his name as a stock gambler he can refuse to pay his losses. Transactions in futures on agricultural products are prohibited. In Paris, bourse agents are not allowed to operate on their own account. There is a tax on every order to buy or sell and on every completed transaction. The French system is analogous to the taxing, licensing, and regulating of ordinary gambling houses by the French Government.

The forms which the New York Stock Exchange go through to evade the New York gambling law are in vogue nowhere else.

GOVERNMENT REGULATION.

The French and German governments treat stock gambling somewhat as race-track gambling is now treated in New York State, where it is permitted in race-track inclosures and forbidden elsewhere. But these continental governments go further. They even decide in what stocks and bonds they will allow gambling.

During the Japanese-Russian war the French Government instructed the Parisian brokers that no one might sell or offer for sale Russian bonds without giving their serial number. This prevented short selling. In Germany similar measures have been taken.

On both the Paris and London exchanges the brokers who do the buying and selling on the floor are distinct from the brokers who do business with the customers. The floor brokers do business only for other brokers, just as an English barrister—that is, the lawyer who tries the case in court—is not retained by the client, who deals with an office lawyer called the solicitor.

As a result of this separation of stock gambling from the banking business of the country the great drop in Russian bonds, hundreds of millions of dollars of which are owned in France, caused hardly a ripple on the surface of French trade and manufacture. The great fall in the market prices of South African gold and diamond mine stocks at the time of the Boer war did not shut off discounts and banking facilities to English manufacturers, forwarders, and merchants.

What other countries have done in segregating and restricting stock gambling the United States also must do, remembering always that Wall street also performs a legitimate function in providing capital for great enterprises and in affording a market for the actual sale of securities.

OVERCERTIFICATION.

The overcertification of checks is already a crime under the national banking law. Section 176 specifically prohibits the certification of any check "unless the person or company drawing the check has on deposit at the time such check is certified the amount of money equal to the amount certified in such check."

This of course prohibits certifying a check before 2.15 p. m. on the strength of deposits after 2.15 p. m. Its violation, however, is difficult to prove, and its evasion is easy by a broker putting in dummy notes at the time of certification.

STOCK-TRANSFER TAX.

One way to diminish stock gambling is to increase the tax upon it. Last year one-quarter of the revenue of this State was derived from the $2 tax on every transfer of 100 shares of stock. The enormous amount of these stock-gambling transactions is shown by the fact that in spite of gross evasions of payment, over $6,000,000 was collected, equivalent to 3,000,000 sales of 100-share lots. The ordinary broker's commission is one-eighth of 1 per cent on the par value, or $12.50 on one hundred $100 shares. A tax of one-sixth of the broker's fee has had no appreciable effect to diminish the amount of stock gambling. Through the clearing-house system the floor traders escape this tax on many of their gambles by clearing stock and not delivering it.

This tax could be greatly increased. A tax of one-half of 1 per cent on all gambling transactions in stocks, grain, and cotton would pay all the State taxes, all the taxes of New York City, and all the taxes of every county, city, and town in the State.

ABOLISH STOCK GAMBLING.

To segregate stock gambling, as is done in Europe, and to make both unprofitable and illegal the use of other people's money by Wall street gamblers without the consent of the real owner, three short, simple changes in the State and national banking laws would suffice.

First. Require every bank to keep its legal reserve in the form of legal-tender money in its own vaults, instead of as bank credits in Wall street. This would retain in the banks of the manufacturing and agricultural sections of the country the real money necessary for wages and for moving the crops.

Second. Prohibit the payment of interest on demand deposits. A demand deposit is the correlative to a call loan, which is a Wall street gambling device. Commercial banks can not afford to pay interest on demand deposits. The stock-exchange banks can and do. By prohibiting any bank from paying interest except on time deposits the Wall street banks will be made unable to divert accounts which properly belong to commercial banks.

Third. Divide all check account banks into two classes—commercial and finance; that is, banks of discount and deposit, which make loans only for the facilitation of trade, commerce, and manufacture, and finance banks, which loan for speculative purposes on promotions, syndicate allotments, stock-exchange collateral and the like. Then restrict every bank so that it may not do both kinds of business, and compel trust companies to be trust companies, and not banks. This distinction has been long recognized in England, France, and Germany.

This remedy is national. These amendments to the banking laws would cut off the main source of suply by which the Wall street gamblers are enabled to risk other people's money.

But it is imperative to consider whether this gambling can not be entirely stopped. Certainly the State of New York can greatly restrict it by its power of taxation, which is the power to prohibit. The stock-transfer tax should be greatly increased. Like the excise tax, the receipts should be divided between the city and the State.

A tax of one-half of 1 per cent on all the transactions appearing on the clearing-house sheets of the respective exchanges would be a trifling imposition on legitimate purchases and sales and yet would raise on the basis of last year's transactions an amount more than sufficient to pay all the expenses of the city of New York and the State government and of rebuilding the Erie Canal.

Such a tax would be less than the real estate broker's ordinary fee, and the legitimate transfer of real estate is in no way interferred with thereby. It would be exactly the same per cent as the real estate mortgage tax, which has facilitated loaning upon real estate and added to the market-ability of real estate mortgages.

How much more important is it that Governor Hughes should rid legitimate business of the dominating evil of Wall street gambling than that mere race-track betting be suppressed.

APPENDIX E.

SOUTH BEND, IND., February 1½, 1908.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The masses of the people believe that bank deposits as well as bank currency should have Government guaranty.

If the National Congress does not provide guaranty along rational lines that recognizes relative safety dependent upon amount of capital, then the State legislatures are more than likely to provide guaranty along irrational lines that take into consideration only the word "bank" upon the front window. At least one State has provided guaranty, and deposits are said to be flowing from other States to its banks.

If State guaranty is provided, deposits will go with a rush to State banks and trust companies, national banks will be compelled to change to State banks or trust companies, and then—and then where do you get currency for circulation? State banks and trust companies issue no currency. To increase this class of banks is to decrease currency for circulation.

Even now State banks and trust companies have substantially one-half of the banking capital and deposits. If these banks would become national banks, with no more power of currency issue than national banks now have, do you fully comprehend the tremendous difference in the banking ability to issue currency?

To encourage all banking capital to become national banks some added powers should be given and some reliefs extended, but guaranty of depositors along sane lines would be a long stride in the right direction, as it would bring depositors without reserve and hold them under all conditions.

In my letter of the 1st instant I said: "Postal savings banks would make depositor safe, but take millions from the borrower." I have a letter from the Postmaster-General, dated February 3, which says: "In the Department's plan for establishing postal savings banks it is proposed to redeposit the money in national banks in the locality where it is first received, thus making it immediately available for the legitimate financial transactions of the community to which it properly belongs. As the post-office (Government) is a preferred creditor, it would not demand collateral from the banks in the way of bonds." Such a plan would protect the depositor and not take from the borrower, but would be an added reason why all deposits should be guaranteed, because common creditors are always afraid when associated with preferred creditors. The fact that preferred first gets 100 per cent may cause the common to get nothing. See?

Remember always that the need of Government guaranty is not because of extensive losses, but to quiet that constant and disastrous mutual fear between depositor and bank.

Sincerely, yours,

MARVIN CAMPBELL, President.

OKLAHOMA BANKING LAWS.

[Passed by the fifth regular session of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma and as amended by the seventh and eighth.]

1907.

H. H. Smock, Bank Commissioner.

HOW TO ORGANIZE NEW BANKS.

CHARTER.

First read section 2 of the banking laws which prescribes the amount of capital required according to the population of the town or city in which the bank is to be located. No bank can be organized with less capital than $10,000, fully paid in.

Apply to the secretary of the Territory for blank articles of incorporation. The law requires that the articles of incorporation shall be subscribed by at least three stockholders of the proposed bank, shall be acknowledged by them, and shall recite that the capital stock is fully paid up. After completing the articles of incorporation forward them to the secretary of the Territory, inclosing draft for $10, the secretary's lawful fee for issuing a charter.

Procure a stock certificate book, stock record, minute book for record of minutes of stockholders' and directors' meetings, and a bank seal.

ORGANIZATION.

After the charter has been granted by the secretary of the Territory, the remaining details of organization must be approved by the bank commissioner, and no bank shall commence the business of banking until it has received his certificate of authority.

The banking department requires:

First. Statement showing names of stockholders, residence, amount of stock subscribed, and the amount paid in. The capital stock must be fully paid in cash. (Blanks will be furnished.)

Second. A certified copy of the minutes of the stockholders' meeting showing adoption of by-laws and election of a board of directors. A majority of the stock of the bank must be represented at this meeting.

Third. A copy of the by-laws adopted, typewritten or in pen and ink, certified to by the chairman of the stockholders' meeting and attested by the secretary, and seal of the bank affixed. (Sample form of by-laws furnished.)

Fourth. Oath of directors. Each director elected must take and subscribe to the oath of office. (Blank oaths furnished.)

Fifth. A certified copy of the directors' meeting showing election of officers. The president, vice-president, and secretary must be members of the board of directors. The cashier must be a stockholder, but not necessarily a director. If the cashier is a director he should act as secretary.

Sixth. Reserve banks. The banks with whom a reserve account is to be carried must have a paid-up capital of not less than $25,000, exclusive of surplus and profits, and all funds deposited in other than approved reserve banks will not be counted as part of the lawful reserve. The department will furnish blanks for naming and approval of reserve banks.

Seventh. The full amount of the capital stock of the proposed bank must be deposited with one of the approved reserve banks and the certificate of such reserve bank showing the required amount on deposit with it must be filed in the office of the bank commissioner. (Blank certificates furnished.)

The banking law prescribes a severe penalty for doing a banking business before receiving a certificate of authority from the bank commissioner.

H. H. SMOCK,
Bank Commissioner.

GUTHRIE, OKLA., February 1, 1907.

BANKS AND BANKING.

SECTION 1. Any three or more persons, a majority of whom shall be residents of this Territory, may organize themselves into a banking association and be incorporated as a bank, and shall be permitted to carry on the business of receiving money on deposit, either with or without interest, and of buying and selling exchange, gold, silver, coin, bullion, uncurrent money, bonds of the United States or of this Territory, or any of the cities, counties and school districts therein, and territorial, county, city, township and school district, or other municipal indebtedness, and loaning money on chattel and personal security, and to own a suitable building, furniture and fixtures, for the transaction of its business, the value of which shall not exceed one-third of the capital of such bank fully paid: Provided, That nothing in this section shall prohibit such bank from holding and disposing of such real estate as it may acquire through the collection of debts due to it: And provided, That all banking institutions now organized as corporations doing business in this Territory are hereby permitted to continue said business as at present incorporated, but in all other respects their business and the manner of conducting the same and the operation of said bank shall be carried on subject to the provisions of this Act and in accordance therewith: And provided further, That no bank shall engage in any business other than such as is authorized by this Act.

CAPITAL STOCK.

SEC. 2. (As amended by the Act of 1905.) That hereafter, the capital stock, which shall be fully paid up, shall not be less than ten thousand dollars in towns or cities having less than twenty-five hundred inhabitants; the capital stock, which shall be fully paid up, shall not be less than fifteen thousand dollars in cities having more than twenty-five hundred and less than five thousand inhabitants; the capital stock, which shall be fully paid up, shall not be less than twenty thousand dollars in cities having more than five thousand and less than ten thousand inhabitants; the capital stock, which shall be fully paid up, shall not be less than twenty-five thousand dollars in cities having over ten thousand inhabitants; and in addition to the other requirements of the law, the charter of any such bank shall contain the name and place of residence of each of its stockholders, and the amount of stock subscribed by each, and such other provisions, not inconsistent with the law, as the stockholders may deem proper. The charter shall be subscribed by at least three of the stockholders of the proposed bank, and shall be acknowledged by them, and the full amount of the capital stock shall be fully paid up, not less than two-thirds in lawful money before the charter is filed: Provided, That from and after the passage of this Act, it shall be unlawful for any bank in this Territory, without first amending its charter, to remove or attempt to remove its banking house or place of business from the place named in its original articles of incorporation or charter.

BANKS ORGANIZED, WHEN.

SEC. 3. The existence of such bank as a corporation shall date from the filing of its charter, from which time it shall have and may exercise the powers conferred by law upon corporations generally, except as limited or modified by this Act: Provided, That such bank shall transact no business except the election of officers, the taking and approving their official bonds, the receipts of payments on account of subscriptions to its capital stock, and such other business as is incidental to its organization, until it has been authorized by the bank commissioner provided for hereinafter to commence the business of banking as hereinafter provided for.

SHARES MUST BE PAID IN CASH.

SEC. 4. The capital stock of any such association shall be divided into shares of not less than one hundred dollars each, and all subscriptions to said capital stock shall be paid in cash: Provided, That in the reorganization of a bank, the assets of the old may be accepted in lieu of cash, at their actual value.

COMMISSIONER'S CERTIFICATE OF AUTHORITY.

SEC. 5. (As amended by the Act of 1903.) When the capital stock of any bank shall have been paid up, the president or cashier thereof shall transmit to the Bank Commissioner a verified statement, showing the names and places of residence of the stockholders, the amount of stock subscribed and the amount paid in by each, and the Bank Commissioner shall thereupon have the same power to examine into the condition and affairs of such bank as it had before that time been engaged in the banking business; and he shall, within thirty days, from the receipt of such statement, make such examination, and shall examine especially as to the amount of money paid in on account of its capital, and by whom paid and the amount of capital stock of which each stockholder is, in good faith, the owner, and whether such bank has complied with the provisions of the law in all respects; and if such bank has been organized as prescribed, and has in all respects complied with the provisions of the law, said commissioner shall issue to such bank, under his hand and seal, a certificate showing that it has been organized and its capital paid in as required by law and is authorized to transact a general banking business as provided by this Act.

SEC. 6. This section, which made provision for the payment of the residue of the capital stock, was repealed in toto by the Act of 1903.

INCREASE OF CAPITAL STOCK.

SEC. 7. This section was repealed in toto. It provided for the increase of capital stock to be made only after the original capital stock has been fully paid up. The provisions of law governing increase of capital stock are now found entirely in Section 18, Article 3, of Chapter 17, of the Laws of 1893, which reads as follows:

"Every corporation may increase or diminish its capital stock at a meeting called for that purpose by the directors as follows:

"First. Notice of the time and place of the meeting, stating its object and the amount to which it is proposed to increase or diminish its capital stock must be personally served on each stockholder resident in the Territory, at his place of residence, if known, and if not known, at the place where the principal office of the corporation is situated, and be published in a newspaper published in the county of such principal place of business, once a week for four weeks successively. * * *

"Third. At least two-thirds of the entire capital stock must be represented by the vote in favor of the increase (or diminution) before it can be effected.

"Fourth. A certificate must be signed by the chairman and secretary of the meeting, and a majority of the directors, showing a compliance with the requirements of this section, the amount to which the capital stock has been increased, or diminished, the amount of stock represented at the meeting and the vote by which the object was accomplished.

"Fifth. The certificate must be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Territory, there to be recorded in the book of corporations, and thereupon the capital stock shall be so increased or diminished.

"Sixth. The written assent of the holders of three-fourths of the subscribed capital stock shall be as effectual to authorize the increase or diminution of the capital stock as if a meeting were called and held; and upon such written assent, the directors may proceed to make the certificate herein provided for."

NOTE.—As section 42, of chapter 4, Laws of 1889, makes special provisions for the decrease of capital stock of banks, it supersedes the above section of the Laws of 1893, as far as the diminution of capital stock is concerned. The increase of capital stock will be made in accordance with the above section 18, article 3, chapter 17, of the Laws of 1893, above quoted.

SEC. 8. This section is repealed in toto. It made provision for the sale of stock upon which there had been default in the payments of installments due thereon.

DISSOLUTION.

SEC. 9. Any corporation transacting business under this act may be dissolved by the district court of the county in which its principal place of business is located in the following manner: A verified petition shall be filed in the office of the clerk of said court, signed by the president or a majority of a board of directors, setting forth that two-thirds in amount of the stockholders of such association have adopted a resolution favoring such dissolution, and directing proceedings to be instituted for that purpose, a copy of which resolution shall be set forth, and that all claims and demands against such association have been paid and discharged; and thereupon a notice shall be published in the manner prescribed by law for service by publication. Such notice shall state the name of the court in which the petition has been filed, the substance and purpose thereof, and that unless objections are filed thereto, on or before a time to be stated, which will not be less than forty-one days from the first publication, the relief prayed for will be granted. A copy of such notice shall be sent to the bank commissioner within ten days after the first publication thereof, and he shall within thirty days thereafter make a thorough examination of the affairs of such bank and file a certified copy thereof with said petition. Any person interested may, on or before the time fixed by the notice, and afterwards, if permitted by the court, file a written objection to the dissolution of such corporation. The petition and objection thereto, if any, shall stand for a hearing the same as a civil action; and if upon the hearing thereof the court shall be satisfied that the petition is true and that there is no valid objection to the dissolution of such corporation, it shall render judgment dissolving the same.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

SEC. 10. The affairs and business of any banking corporation doing business under this act shall be managed and controlled by a board of directors, not less than 3 nor more than 13 in number, who shall be selected from the stockholders in the manner provided in the general corporation act, a majority of whom shall be residents of the Territory of Oklahoma; the board shall designate one of their number to act as president and one as secretary, and shall select from among the stockholders a cashier; such officers shall hold their offices for a term of one year and until their successors are elected and qualified. The board shall require the cashier and any and all officers having the care and handling of the funds of the bank to give a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by them and held by such custodian as the board may designate. The board of directors shall hold two regular meetings each year, and at such meetings thorough examination of the books, records, funds, and securities held by each bank shall be made by them, and the result of such examination shall be recorded in detail upon the record book of the bank. A certified copy of the record of such meetings shall be forwarded to the bank commissioner within ten days.

STOCKHOLDERS' LIABILITY.

SEC. 11. The shareholders of every bank organized under this act shall be additionally liable for the amount of stock owned and no more.

INVESTMENTS LIMITED.

SEC. 12. No bank shall employ its moneys directly or indirectly in trade or commerce by buying or selling goods, chattels, wares or merchandise, and shall not invest any of its funds in the stock of any other bank or incorporation, nor make any loans or discount on the security of the shares of its own capital stock, nor be the purchaser or holder of any such shares, unless such securities or purchase shall be necessary to prevent loss upon a debt previously contracted in good faith, and stock so purchased or acquired shall, within six months from the time of its purchase, be sold or disposed of at public or private sale; after the expiration of six months, any such stock shall not be considered as part of the assets of any bank: Provided, That it may sell all kinds of property which may come into its possession as collateral security for loans or any ordinary collection of debts, in the manner prescribed by law.

RESERVE REQUIRED.

SEC. 13. Each bank doing business under this Act shall have on hand at all times in available funds the following sums, to wit: Banks located in towns or cities having a population of less than 2,500 an amount equal to 20 per cent of their entire deposits; banks located in cities having over 2,500 population, an amount equal to 25 per cent of their entire deposits, two-thirds of which may consist of balances due them from good solvent banks located at commercial centers, and at such other points as the Bank Commissioner may approve, and one-third shall consist of actual cash: Provided, That any bank that has been made the depository for the reserve of any bank or banks shall have on hand at all times in the manner provided herein 25 per cent of its deposits. Whenever the available funds in any bank shall be below the required amount, such bank shall not increase its liabilities by making any new loans or discounts otherwise than by discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight, nor make any dividends of its profits until the required proportion between the aggregate amount of its deposits, and its lawful money reserve has been restored; and the Bank Commissioner shall notify any bank whose lawful money reserve shall be below the amount required to be kept on hand, to make good such reserve, and if such bank or association shall fail to do so for a period of thirty days after such notice, it shall be deemed to be insolvent, and the Bank Commissioner shall take possession of the same and proceed in the manner provided in this Act relating to insolvent banks. The Bank Commissioner may refuse to consider, as a part of its reserve, balances due to any bank from any other bank or association which shall refuse or neglect to furnish him with such information as he may require from time to time relating to its business with any other bank doing business under this Act which shall enable him to determine its solvency; Provided, That all savings banks or savings associations which do not transact a general banking business shall be required to keep on hand at all times in actual cash a sum equal to 10 per cent of their deposits, and shall be required to keep a like sum invested in good bonds of the United States or Territorial, county, school district or municipal bonds of the Territory of Oklahoma, worth not less than par.

NOTE.—This section gives the Bank Commissioner absolute discretion as to where banks shall keep their reserves. The rule of the department is that no bank having a paid-up capital of less than $25,000.00 shall be considered a reserve agent.

EXCESS LOANS.

SEC. 14. The total liability to any bank of any person or company, corporation or firm, for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of the company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall not at any time exceed 20 per cent of the capital stock and surplus of such bank actually paid in; but the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actual existing receipts as collateral security, and a discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, shall not be considered as money borrowed. The Bank Commissioner may at any time order an excess loan reduced to the legal limit within sixty days from the date of notification by him.

FALSE REPORT.

SEC. 15. Every officer, director, agent or clerk of any bank doing business under the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma who wilfully and knowingly subscribes to or makes any false report, or any false statements or entries in the books of such bank, or knowingly subscribes to or exhibits any false writings on paper, with the intent to deceive any person as to the condition of such bank, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the Territorial prison not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

RECEIVING DEPOSITS WHEN INSOLVENT.

SEC. 16. No bank shall accept or receive on deposit, with or without interest, any money, bank bills or notes, or United States treasury notes, gold or silver certificates, or currency, or other notes, bills, checks, or drafts, when such bank is insolvent; and any officer, director, cashier, manager, member, party or managing party of any bank, who shall knowingly violate the provisions of this section, or be accessory to or permit, or connive at the receiving or accepting of any such deposit, shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

VIOLATIONS PUNISHED.

SEC. 17. It shall be unlawful for any individual, firm or corporation to transact a banking business, or to receive deposits, except by this act authorized. Any person violating any provisions of this section, either individually or as an interested party in any association or corporation, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not less than three hundred dollars or more than one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail not less than thirty days nor more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

REPORTS, WHEN MADE.

SEC. 18. Every bank shall make out at least four reports each year, and oftener if called upon, to the Bank Commissioner, according to the form which may be prescribed by him, verified by the oath or affirmation of the president or cashier of such association, and attested by the signatures of at least two of the directors. Each such report shall exhibit, in detail and under the appropriate heads, the resources and liabilities of the association at the close of business on any past day by him specified, and shall be transmitted to the Bank Commissioner within ten days after the receipt of a request or requisition therefor by him, and shall be punished in the same form in which it is made to the Bank Commissioner, except that cash and sight exchange may be shown under one heading and shall be published within ten days after the same is made out in a newspaper published in the county in which such bank is established, for two insertions, at the expense of the bank; and such proof of publication shall be furnished within five days after date of last publication, as may be required by the Bank Commissioner. The Bank Commissioner shall also have power to call for special reports from any bank whenever in his judgment the same are necessary in order to gain a full and complete knowledge of its condition. The verification of such statement shall be in the following form:

Territory of Oklahoma, County of ——— ss:

I ——— president (or cashier) of said bank, do solemnly swear that the above statement is true, that said bank has no other liabilities, and is not indorser on any note or obligation, other than that shown in the above statement, to the best of my knowledge and belief, so help me, God.

———, President.
———, Cashier.

Provided, The reports authorized and required by this section, to be called for by the Commissioner, shall relate to a date prior to the date of such call to be specified therein.

DIVIDEND REPORTED.

SEC. 19. In addition to the reports required by the preceding sections each bank doing business under this Act, shall within ten days after the declaring of any dividend, forward to the Bank Commissioner a statement of the amount of such dividend and the amount carried to the surplus and undivided profit accounts and shall also forward to the Commissioner, within ten days after the first of January in each year, in such form as he may designate, a verified statement showing the receipts and disbursements of such bank for the preceding year.

PENALTY FOR FAILURE TO REPORT.

SEC. 20. Every bank which fails to make and transmit or to publish any report required under either of the two preceding sections, shall be subject to a penalty of fifty dollars for each day after the period respectively therein mentioned, that it delays to make and transmit its report or the proof of publication. Whenever any bank delays or refuses to pay the penalty herein imposed for a failure to make and transmit or to publish a report, the Commissioner is hereby authorized to maintain an action, in the name of his office, against the delinquent bank for the recovery of such penalty, and all sums collected by such action shall be paid into the Territorial treasury and placed to the credit of the banking department.

DISSOLUTION BY BANK COMMISSIONER.

SEC. 21. Every bank, except national banks, doing business in the Territory of Oklahoma, which shall refuse or neglect to comply with any requirement lawfully made upon it by the bank commissioner pursuant to this act, for a period of ninety days after demand in writing is made, shall be deemed to have forfeited its franchise, and the bank commissioner shall thereupon revoke its authority to transact the banking business, by publication in the official county paper of the county in which the bank is located, and any failure on the part of such banks to comply with, or any violation of the provisions of this act, shall work a forfeiture of its franchise; and in either case the attorney general, upon the request of the bank commissioner, shall commence an action for the purpose of dissolving said corporation.

SEC. 22. The governor shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the council of the legislative assembly, a bank commissioner for the Territory of Oklahoma, whose term of office shall be for two years, the first term commencing on the first day of March, 1899, and (continuing) until his successor is appointed and qualified. No officer or employee of any bank, or any person interested as owner or stockholder of any bank, shall be eligible for the office of bank commissioner: Provided, That no person shall be appointed as bank commissioner who shall not have had, prior to such appointment, at least three years' actual experience as a banker.

BOND AND OATH.

SEC. 23. The bank commissioner shall, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, take and subscribe the usual oath of office and execute to the Territory of Oklahoma a bond in the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars with sufficient surety for the faithful performance of his duty, to be approved and filed as provided by law.

DUTIES.

SEC. 24. It shall be the duty of such Commissioner to visit each and every bank doing business in this Territory, except national banks, at least once in each year, and oftener, if necessary, for the purpose of making a full and careful investigation and inquiry into the condition of affairs of such bank; and for that purpose the Commissioner is hereby authorized and empowered to administer oaths, and to examine under oath the owners and directors, and all officers and employees and agents of such bank. The Commissioner shall reduce the result thereof to writing, which shall contain a full, true and careful statement of the condition of such bank. No loan shall be made by any bank to any of its officers or employees, except upon the express order of the board of directors, made in the absence of the applicant, duly entered in the record of the board proceedings, and only upon the same security as required of others. Any officer or employee of the bank violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement.

It shall be the duty of the Bank Commissioner to keep a record of all fees collected by him, together with the record of the expenses incurred in making examinations of all banks, and at the end of each quarter pay over to the Territorial Treasurer all fees collected during the preceding quarter, and he shall file with the Territorial Treasurer an itemized statement, showing from whom collected.

NUMBER OF REPORTS REQUIRED.

SEC. 27. The Commissioner shall have power at any time when he deems it necessary, to call upon any bank, except national banks, for a report of its condition upon any given day which has passed, or as often as the Commissioner may deem it necessary: Provided, That the Commissioner shall require four such reports at least, during each and every year.

CALL FOR STATEMENT.

SEC. 29. If upon examination made by the Commissioner or from any report made to the Commissioner, it shall appear that any bank is insolvent, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner immediately to take charge of such bank and all the property and effects thereof. Upon taking charge of any bank, the Commissioner shall, as soon as possible, ascertain by thorough examination into its affairs, its actual financial condition, and whenever he shall become satisfied that such bank can not resume business or liquidate its indebtedness to the satisfaction of all its creditors, he shall institute proper proceedings in the proper court for the purpose of having a receiver appointed to take charge of such bank and to wind up the affairs and business thereof, for the benefit of its depositors, creditors, and stockholders. The Bank Commissioner may appoint a Special Deputy Bank Commissioner to take charge of the affairs of an insolvent bank temporarily, until a receiver is appointed; such deputy to qualify, and give bond and receive compensation at the rate of four dollars per day, such compensation to be paid by such bank or allowed by the court as costs in case of the appointment of a receiver: Provided, That in no case shall any bank continue in charge of such special deputy for a longer period than thirty days.

COMMISSIONER IN POSSESSION, ATTACHMENT BARRED.

SEC. 30. Any bank doing business under this Act, may place its affairs and assets under the control of the Bank Commissioner by posting a notice on its front door as follows: "This bank is in the hands of the Territorial Bank Commissioner." The posting of such notice, or the taking possession of any bank by the Bank Commissioner shall be sufficient to place all of its assets and property of whatever nature in the possession of the Bank Commissioner and shall operate as a bar to any attachment proceedings except where deposits were received after the bank was known to be in a failing condition.

VOLUNTARY LIQUIDATION.

SEC. 31. Any bank doing business under this Act, may voluntarily liquidate by paying off all its depositors in full, and upon filing a verified statement with the Bank Commissioner setting forth the fact that all its liabilities have been paid, and the surrendering of its certificate of authority to transact a banking business, it shall cease to be subject to the provisions of this Act, and may continue to transact a loan and discount business under its charter: Provided, That the Bank Commissioner shall make an examination of any such bank for the purpose of determining that all its liabilities have been paid.

WHEN INSOLVENT.

SEC. 32. A bank shall be deemed to be insolvent, first, when the actual cash market value of its assets is insufficient to pay its liabilities; second, when it is unable to meet the demands of its creditors in the usual and customary manner; third, when it shall fail to make good its reserve as required by law.

DIVIDENDS.

SEC. 33. The directors or owners of any bank doing business under this act, may declare dividends of so much of the net profits of their bank as they shall judge expedient but each bank shall, before the declaration of a dividend, carry one-tenth of its net profits since the last preceding dividend to its surplus fund, until the same shall amount to 50 per cent of its capital stock.

NOTE.—A dividend can only be declared by a regular act of the board of directors, entered upon the minute or record book of the bank, and 10 per cent of the net profits must in every case be passed to the surplus fund, until the surplus is equal to one-half of the bank's capital stock.

SURPLUS FUND NOT DISTURBED.

SEC. 34. Any losses sustained by any bank, in excess of its undivided profits, may be charged to its surplus account: Provided, That its surplus fund shall hereafter be reimbursed from its earnings, and no dividend shall be declared or paid by any such bank until its surplus fund shall be fully restored to its former amount.

CAPITAL NOT DIMINISHED.

SEC. 35. No bank officer or director thereof shall, during the time it shall continue its banking operations, withdraw or permit to be withdrawn, either in form of dividends or otherwise, any portion of its capital. If losses have been at any time sustained by such bank equal to or exceeding its undivided profits then on hand, no dividend shall be made, and no dividend shall be declared by any bank while it continues its banking business to any amount greater than its profits on hand, deducting therefrom its losses, to be ascertained by a careful estimate of the actual cash value of all its assets at the time of making such dividends. The present worth of all maturing paper shall be estimated at the usual discount rate of the bank. Nothing in this section shall prevent the reduction of the capital stock of any bank in the manner prescribed herein.

NOTE.—Before any dividend is declared, the officers and directors should first go over the bank's assets carefully and charge off any bad assets.

SEC. 36. PAYING OVER-DRAFTS.

The capital stock of any bank doing business under this act may be reduced at any time by resolution adopted by a three-fourths vote of its stockholders, at any regular meeting or at a special meeting held for that purpose, of which all stockholders shall have due notice, subject to the approval of the Bank Commissioner, which shall not be given unless such bank with such reduced capital is entirely solvent. When the Bank Commissioner has approved of any such reduction, a certificate, signed by the president and cashier of the bank setting forth the reduction of its capital and the names and amount of stock held by its stockholders, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Territory, and a duplicate copy shall be forwarded to the Bank Commissioner. Whenever the capital of any bank shall be reduced as provided in this section, every stockholder, owner or holder of any stock certificate, shall surrender same for cancellation, and shall be entitled to receive a new certificate for his proportion of the new stock: Provided, That such capital stock shall not be reduced more than is provided in section 2 of this act.

SEC. 44. APPENDIX I.

THE WILLIAMS-RODDIE BANKING BILL.

Passed by the first State Legislature of the State of Oklahoma and approved by the governor December 17, 1907.

Amendatory and supplemental to the Oklahoma banking laws as heretofore published in pamphlet form by the banking department.

OKLAHOMA BANKING LAW.

Banks are semipublic institutions. The character of their business is such that they must practically stand or fall together, and a law that protects depositors will of itself be the best protection that the banks themselves can have.

Honesty and capability in banking are indispensable to proper protection of the depositors and for protection of the banks themselves.

Dishonest and reckless banking must not exist.

Active managers of banks must not be borrowers from their own banks.

Banks must be frequently and carefully examined.

The following new sections and amendments have been made to the existing banking laws of the State of Oklahoma, which gives the State a code of laws which forever insures the stability of the banks and the safety of deposits:

Be it enacted by the people of the State of Oklahoma:

SECTION 1. A State banking board is hereby created, to be composed of the governor, lieutenant-governor, president of the State board of agriculture, State treasurer, and the State auditor.

SEC. 2. Within sixty days after the passage and approval of this act, the State banking board shall levy against the capital stock, an assessment of one per cent of the bank's daily average deposits, less the deposits of State funds properly secured, for the preceding year, upon each and every bank organized and existing under the laws of this State, for the purpose of creating a depositors' guaranty fund. Said assessment shall be collected upon call of the State banking board.

In one year from the time the first assessment is levied, and annually thereafter, each bank subject to the provisions of this act, shall report to the bank commissioners the amount of its average daily deposits for the preceding year, and if said deposits are in excess of the amount upon which one per cent was previously paid, said report shall be accompanied by additional funds to equal one per cent of the said daily average excess of deposits, less the deposits of State funds properly secured, and less deposits of the National Government, for the year over the preceding year, and each amount shall be added to the depositors' guaranty fund.

If the depositors' guaranty fund is depleted from any cause, it shall be the duty of the State banking board, in order to keep said fund to one per cent of the total deposits in all of the banks subject to the provisions of this act, to levy a special assessment to cover such deficiency, which special assessment shall be levied upon the capital stock of the banks subject to this act, according to the amount of their deposits, as reported in the office of the bank commissioner, and said special assessment shall become immediately due and payable.

SEC. 3. Banks organized subsequent to the enactment of this act shall pay into the depositors' guaranty fund 3 per cent of the amount of their capital stock when they open for business, which amount shall constitute a credit fund, subject to adjustment on the basis of its deposits as provided for other banks now existing at the end of one year; provided, however, said three per cent payment shall not be required of new banks formed by the reorganization or consolidation of banks that have previously complied with the terms of this act.

SEC 4. Any national bank in this State, approved by the bank commissioner, may voluntarily avail its depositors of the protection of the depositors' guaranty fund, by application to the State banking board, in writing, and the said application may be sustained upon terms and conditions in harmony with the purpose of this act, to be agreed upon by the State banking board, the bank commissioner, and the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States: Provided, That in the event national banks should be required by Federal enactment to pay assessments to any depositors' guaranty fund of the Federal Government, and thereby the deposits in national banks in this State should be guaranteed by virtue of Federal laws, that the national banks having availed themselves of the benefits of this act, may withdraw therefrom and have returned to them ninety per cent of the unused portion of all assessments levied upon and paid by said banks.

SEC. 5. Whenever any bank organized or existing under the laws of this State shall voluntarily place itself in the hands of the bank commissioner, or whenever any judgment shall be rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction adjudging and decreeing that such bank is insolvent, or whenever its rights or franchises to conduct a banking business under the laws of this State shall have been adjudged to be forfeited, or whenever the bank commissioner shall become satisfied of the insolvency of any such bank, he may, after due examination of its affairs, take possession of said bank and its assets and proceed to wind up its affairs and to enforce the personal liability of the stockholders, officers, and directors.

SEC. 6. In the event that the bank commissioner shall take possession of any bank which is subject to the provisions of this act, depositors of said bank shall be paid in full, and when the cash available, or that can be made immediately available, of said bank is insufficient to discharge its obligations to depositors, the said banking board shall draw from the depositors' guaranty fund and from additional assessments, if required, as provided in section 3, the amount necessary to make up the deficiency, and the State shall have, for the benefit of the depositors' guaranty fund, a first lien upon the assets of said bank, and all liabilities against the stockholders, officers, and directors of said bank, and against all other persons, corporations, or firms. Such liabilities may be enforced by the State for the benefit of the depositors' guaranty fund.

SEC. 7. The bank commissioner shall take possession of the books, records, and assets of every description of such bank; collect debts, dues, and claims belonging to it, and upon order of the district court or judge thereof may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell all the real or personal property of such banks upon such terms as the court or judge thereof may direct, and may, if necessary, pay the debts of such bank and then enforce the liability of the stockholders, officers and directors; Provided, however, that bad or doubtful debts as used in this section shall not include the liability of stockholders, officers, or directors.

SEC. 8. It shall be the duty of the bank commissioner, or one of his assistants, to visit each and every bank, subject to the provisions of this act, at least twice each year, and oftener if he deem it advisable, for the purpose of making a full and careful examination and inquiry into the condition of the affairs of such bank; and for that purpose the bank commissioner and his assistants are hereby authorized and empowered to administer oaths, and to examine under oath the stockholders and directors and all officers and employees and agents of such banks, or other persons. The commissioner shall reduce the result thereof to writing, which shall contain a full, true, and careful statement of the conditions of such bank, and file and retain same in his office.

SEC. 9. The bank commissioner's salary shall be twenty-five hundred dollars ($2,500) per annum and traveling expenses, and he shall appoint, subject to the approval of the Governor, necessary assistants, and the salary of each assistant shall not exceed fifteen hundred dollars ($1,500) per annum and traveling expenses.

SEC. 10. The bank commissioner shall deliver to each bank that has complied with the provisions of this act a certificate stating that said bank has complied with the laws of this State for the protection of bank depositors, and that safety to its depositors is guaranteed by the depositors' guaranty fund of the State of Oklahoma. Said certificate shall be conspicuously displayed in its place of business, and said bank may print or engrave upon its stationery and advertising matter words to the effect that its depositors are protected by the depositors' guaranty fund of the State of Oklahoma. The printing or engraving of a false statement to the fact last before this named is hereby declared to be a felony.

SEC. 11. After the bank commissioner shall have taken possession of any bank which is subject to the provisions of this act, the stockholders thereof may repair its credit, restore, or substitute its reserves, and otherwise place it in condition so that it is qualified to do a general banking business as before it was taken possession of by the bank commissioner; but such bank shall not be permitted to reopen its business until the commissioner, after a careful investigation of its affairs, is of the opinion that its stockholders have complied with the laws; that the bank's credit and funds are in all respects repaired, and all advances, if any, made from the depositors' guaranty fund fully repaid, its reserve restored or sufficiently substituted, and that it should be permitted to again reopen for business, whereupon said bank commissioner is authorized to issue written permission for reopening of said bank in the same manner as permission to do business is granted after the incorporation thereof, and thereupon said bank may be reopened to do a general banking business.

SEC. 12. No person shall be eligible as director of any bank organized or existing under the laws of this State unless being otherwise qualified he is also the bona fide owner of five hundred dollars ($500) of the stock of such bank fully paid and not hypothecated. Such stock shall not be pledged for any loan or debt. Any director, other officer, or person who shall participate in any violation of the laws of this State relating to banking and banks shall be liable for all damages which the said bank, its stockholders, depositors, or any other person shall sustain in consequence of such violation.

SEC. 13. It shall be unlawful for any active managing officer of any bank organized or existing under the laws of this State to borrow, directly or indirectly, money from the bank with which he is connected. The officer authorizing a loan to any of said persons, as well as the person receiving the same, shall be deemed guilty of larceny of the amount borrowed.

SEC. 14. Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk, officer, or agent of any bank who willfully embezzles, abstracts, or misapplies any of the moneys, funds, securities, or willfully assigns any note, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment, or decree, or who willfully makes use of the bank in any manner with intent in either case to injure or defraud the bank or any individual, person, company, or corporation, or to deceive any officer of the bank, and any person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, agent, or clerk in any violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of larceny, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as for larceny of the amount directly involved.

SEC. 15. Every bank doing business under the laws of this State shall have on hand at all times in available funds the following sums, to wit: Banks located in towns or cities having a population of less than 2,500 persons, an amount equal to 20 per cent of their entire deposits; banks located in cities having over 2,500 population, an amount equal to 25 per cent of their entire deposits, two-thirds of which may consist of balances due to them from good, solvent banks, selected from time to time with the approval of the Bank Commissioner, and one-third shall consist of actual cash: Provided, That any bank that has been made the depository for the reserve of any other bank or banks shall have on hand at all times in the manner provided herein 25 per cent of its deposits. Whenever the available funds in any bank shall be below the required amount, such bank shall not increase its liabilities by making any new loans or discounts otherwise than by discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight, nor make any dividends of its profits, until the required proportion between the aggregate amount of its deposits and its lawful money reserve has been restored; and the Bank Commissioner shall notify any bank whose lawful money reserve shall be below the amount required to be kept on hand to make good such reserve, and if such bank or association shall fail to do so for a period of thirty days after such notice it shall be deemed to be insolvent, and the Bank Commissioner shall take possession of the same and proceed in the manner provided in this act relating to insolvent banks. The Bank Commissioner may refuse to consider, as a part of its reserves, balances due to any bank from any other bank or association which shall refuse or neglect to furnish him with such information as he may require from time to time relating to its business with any other bank doing business under this act which shall enable him to determine its solvency: Provided, That all savings banks or savings associations which do not transact a general banking business shall be required to keep on hand at all times in actual cash a sum equal to 10 per cent of their deposits, and shall be required to keep a like sum invested in good bonds of the United States, or State, county, school district, or municipal bonds of the State of Oklahoma, worth not less than par.

SEC. 16. The total liabilities to any bank, of any person, company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including the liabilities of the company or firm, and the liabilities of the several members thereof shall not at any time exceed 20 per cent of the capital stock of such bank actually paid in, but the discount of bills of exchange, drawn in good faith against actual existing values, as collateral security, and a discount of commercial or business paper, actually owned by the person, shall not be considered as money borrowed: Provided, however, That any bank without impairing its reserve, may advance funds to any person, company, corporation, or firm to assist in marketing agricultural products in amounts not exceeding 75 per cent of its paid-up capital. Such advances or loans must be limited to 75 per cent of the actual cash market value of such products, secured by elevator receipts, warehouse certificates, or yard tickets, with fire-insurance policies in amount to guarantee the bank against loss. The Bank Commissioner shall require any bank to reduce or liquidate any of the aforesaid loans when he deems the security insufficient, believes that the loans are being carried for speculation, or that the condition of the bank will not justify such loans.

SEC. 17. The violation of any of the provisions of this act by the officers or directors of any bank organized or existing subject to the laws of this State shall be a sufficient cause to subject the said bank to be closed by the Bank Commissioner and for the annulment of its charter.

[Amending section 21 of the banking laws.]

SEC. 18. Any officer of a bank found by the Bank Commissioner to be dishonest, reckless, or incompetent shall be removed from office by the board of directors of the bank of which he is an officer on the written order of the Bank Commissioner.

Approved December 17, 1907.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

Absorbs capital, inspires gambling, cripples legitimate commerce, is the home of false pretenses and spurious goods.

A LEGITIMATE EXCHANGE is a business necessity.

It should exist under control of an official board created by law.

It should list no securities except such as the board find have been lawfully issued, and with substantial worth, based on substantial assets.

An inventory statement should be given the public, showing the real assets back of listed stocks and bonds, so that the purchaser may know the intrinsic value thereof.

Tangible as well as intangible assets should be truthfully shown.

If the assets are property, or cash, or good will, or tariff favoritism, or whatever the assets may consist of, give the public fair notice.

Wash sales should never be permitted.

Short selling should never be permitted.

Margin transactions are gambling, and should be prohibited.

The concentration of vast volumes of call loans to a few borrowers (an incident to margin trading), and subject to payment on demand, will forever make the finances of our country unstable, and therefore should be restricted.

Officers of a stock exchange should not be permitted to trade therein.

Officers of a corporation, whose securities are listed, should not be permitted to trade therein.

Lenders of money (or the officers) for stock-exchange dealing should not be permitted to trade on the exchange directly or indirectly.

In short, a stock exchange under lawful control should be limited to bona fide purchases and sales of legitimate securities.

A SAMPLE INVENTORY.

If the truth were told by correct inventory to-day of three-fourths of the largest capitalized industrial companies that have manipulated their way onto the New York Stock Exchange list since 1901, for each one hundred million dollars capitalization, the statement would read about like this:

Mills, stock on hand, and all other tangible property	$20,000,000
Working capital	5,000,000
Value of patents (not cost, of course)	25,000,000
Estimated benefit of tariff law	50,000,000
Total	100,000,000

And most of them would show even more water and less real value.

Extracts from address of Governor C. N. Haskell before Kay County (Okla.) Farmers' Institute:

"We are not here to encourage strife, envy, or jealousy between people of different walks in life; our hope is to aid in promoting brotherly love. But brotherly love can only be the outgrowth of equal and exact justice.

"Life, to be a period of happiness, comfort, and prosperity, must be mutual. Farmers, bankers, merchants, manufacturers, railroads, and other interests are each and every one of them a part of the necessary aggregate, each one essential to the welfare of the other.

"The great family of industry and progress is divisible into two general classes:

"First, those who create the things indispensable to life and the basis of all business (and the farmer is the head and shoulders of this entire class).

"Second, those whose business is the handling of created things. The banker finances the business, the railroads transport the freight, the merchants distribute the products and the goods throughout the land, and the manufacturer supplies the implements and tools; all have their usefulness in life, and the aim of government should be to preserve equally and to prevent one class from overreaching or preying upon another.

"Pioneer life in every State has demonstrated the fact that it is possible for the producing class to live without the other business elements, but that existence in pioneer days was short of the comforts of life that these aggregate elements afford; but I do say that when I see the producing class forced to content themselves in Newkirk to-day with a 25-cent dinner at a restaurant, and know that some of the commission class in the great business centers require a $5 lunch, I am constrained to believe that the difference between the producer and the agent is too great to indicate 'equal and exact justice to all.' It reminds me that it is not sufficient for us to shout for joy over dollar wheat and 10-cent cotton, unless the actual producers are getting a fair share of these prices.

"ANOMALOUS CONDITIONS.

"Never before in the history of our country have we faced such an anomalous condition as now confronts us.

"Our crops are bountiful.

"The prices are good.

"And yet a financial panic is upon us.

"Nothing can be more absurd. We are like unto the man of great wealth whose millions might be stored in a vault with the door locked and the key lost, and in consequence the man starving for his supper.

"There must be a reason for such remarkable and absurd conditions.

"FINANCES.

"My judgment is that this reason is found in a too limited circulating medium in the first place, and, secondly, in the unrestricted use of what money we have for gambling purposes. The first proposition is one that has been talked so many years that we are not going to take time in our weak thoughts to supplement the able arguments that all of you have heard in years past, but to the second proposition I want to devote a little time.

"First, permit me to read quotations and comment of the New York World, renewed by comment from the Wall Street Journal (of November 20):

"'You can look for immediate relief wherever you please. When you tire of looking elsewhere, you will agree with me that the quickest road to financial relief is to close the New York Stock Exchange and free the currency that it dominates and turn it into the channels of legitimate commerce.'—Governor Haskell, of Oklahoma, in his inaugural address.

"'I also regard it as most desirable that the taxing power of the Government should be used to prevent gambling in railroad stocks by taxing all sales, where delivery is not made within such reasonable time as to indicate that the transaction was bona fide and not for speculation.'—Chairman Hepburn, of the House Committee on Interstate Commerce.

"'All this is notoriously true. For three weeks and more legitimate business has been bled white in order that ready cash could be provided to keep the Wall street gambling game in operation.'—New York World.

"'All this is notoriously untrue. The legitimate business of the country has not been bled during the past three weeks in order that ready cash could be provided to keep the Wall street gambling game in operation. As a matter of plain fact, Wall street speculation has been at a minimum during the whole period of the panic. The fact that the stock exchange has been open and its market in operation during this panic has been one of the most beneficent facts of the situation. It has been of enormous value to the country. It has, for one thing, provided a place where the bond and security reserves of the banks and of individuals could be sold in order to obtain the cash with which to meet the needs of the country. Moreover, one of the saving clauses of the panic has been the enormous investment buying in small lots for cash in Wall street. Margin operations have been strictly discouraged. The closing of the Stock Exchange during this panic would have been a national calamity. It is not too much to say that it would have plunged the country into universal insolvency.

"'Moreover, it may be said tath for a year or more, it has not been Wall street speculation which has extended the credits of the country so much as the speculation in real estate that has been in progress, not merely in New York, but throughout the country, and to this speculation Oklahoma has contributed its share.

"'The idea of abolishing the stock exchange as a cure for financial ills has been frequently advanced in times like this. But any country which attempts to prevent speculation will only hurt itself. Such a remedy is like cutting off one's nose to spite one's face. That Wall street might well increase its rate of margin from 10 to 20 or 25 per cent in its speculative operations in order to cut off a lot of speculation which is unsound and dangerous, is probable, but any tax levied upon business is a tax upon enterprise. Speculation has its place in the economy of business. It may be, and often is, grossly abused, but it enormously facilitates the advancement of enterprise, and if this country wishes to progress as it has in the past, it should be careful to maintain as free from outside interference as possible its great market for securities.

"'Germany has tried the experience of restricting stock trading in Berlin in order to stop speculation, but with such injurious effects that it is now considering a plan for reinstating a free market.'—Wall Street Journal.

"I am ready to agree that a stock exchange, conducted under regulations of law for the purpose of affording a convenient place to buy and sell legitimate stocks and bonds, would be a public convenience, if not indeed a public necessity.

"But the stock exchange, as conducted for years, is a public calamity, where intrigue, conspiracy, avarice, recklessness, malice and the spirit of gambling hold full sway, and destroy any element of usefulness that legitimate business might enjoy. We commonly speak of the New York Stock Exchange, because it is the central organ, to which all other exchanges in our country are tributary.

"LISTING STOCKS.

"The admitting to the lists of the stock exchanges of stock and bonds of any company for trade upon its floor should be, at least, a guaranty of intrinsic value, stability and honesty, so far, at least, as moral obligation would assure the people. Contrary to the opinion of some writers, I think that the stock exchanges should not list securities upon new, unknown or incomplete enterprises, but that the lists should be limited to known proven values. This is not done, and is one of the sources of greatest danger. No inflated issues of stocks or bonds should ever be admitted to the lists.

"WASH SALES.

"Publicity has corrected many evils, and will have to be called into use many times again for the same purpose. Every sale and purchase on the stock exchange should carry with it publicity, the name of the seller and the purchaser as a necessary means of avoiding wash sales, and other crooked practices, which are possible only by the present methods of secrecy. Under the present rules of the exchange, nobody but the broker and his client are supposed to know who is the seller, and nobody but the opposite broker and his client are supposed to know who the purchaser is. If you were to ask one of the managers of the stock exchange if wash sales are permitted he would tell you 'Certainly not,' and yet one familiar with the practices knows that invariably markets are boomed (particularly on newly listed securities) by a persistent system of selling and buying back and forth between the schemers, who have manufactured securities of little intrinsic value, and are trying to entice the suckers (sometimes called lambs) into the buying side of the market. This is carried on for days; while the newspapers publishing daily purchases of the stock sought to be boomed, and with a constantly advancing price the lambs are impressed with the notion that the stocks are active and will continue to rise in value. It is only then that the wash sales cease and the lambs are given a chance to buy uninterruptedly, and the next thing that happens the schemers have unloaded millions of dollars' worth of valueless stocks and bonds upon a multitude of inexperienced and uninformed purchasers, all because a stock exchange exists for the benefit of the gamblers, and not for the protection of the buyers of legitimate securities.

"SHORT SELLING.

"If stock exchange dealing as managed to-day is not a gambling proposition, then why permit anyone to sell something that he don't own, and can't deliver unless he can afterwards borrow or buy it from another (in case delivery is ever required)? The facts are that open short selling of stock is carried on to a limit where the entire outstanding issue of that particular stock is oversold, and delivery could not possibly be made if all of the purchasers demanded their stock at one time. The fact is that the seller had nothing to sell, but was simply betting his margin money that his liberal selling and other conditions would so beat down the market price of that particular stock that he could turn buyer himself in time and secure enough stock (purchased at a lower price) to cover his short sales, and thereby make a profit. He might just as well have bet the amount of his margin money that the sun would not shine to-morrow, and then wait the result to see whether he had won or lost his bet. Will the Wall Street Journal contend that the short selling of Northern Pacific stock in May, 1902, which run the price of that stock up to $1,000 per share, and for a time demoralized finances throughout the country, was beneficial to legitimate commerce?

"MARGIN DEALING.

"It can safely be said that less than 5 per cent of the stock exchange transactions are for the bona fide purpose of either selling what is owned, or buying as an outright purchaser. It is an old saying among the New York Stock Exchange veterans that two classes of persons only can ever hope to get rich on the stock exchange. First, those who manufacture stocks and bonds of little actual cost and boom the price until they unload on the lambs. Second, the brokers who are content to act for others in buying or selling, earn their commission of $12.50 on each 100 shares, and put it in their pockets for keeps. Legitimate business necessitates that a stock exchange should be limited to bona fide sales and purchases, but the stock exchange as it is run is at least 95 per cent of it a margin business, and by a margin business we mean that the seller goes into the broker's office and deposits $1,000 in money (for example) and orders the broker to buy him $10,000 worth of the stock or bonds indicated. The broker becomes banker and broker at the same time, and in turn borrows the money from the great financial institutions of Wall street and vicinity to carry practically all of the other $9,000.

"The short seller likewise margins his order with usually about 10 per cent of the par value of the thing which he desires the broker to sell. There are two principal objections to permitting the margin business. First, the gambling feature. It induces people to buy and sell on the stock exchange purely as a wager, a mere bet that the future prices will either go higher or lower (as the case may be), and this character of transaction is not in the slightest degree beneficial to the legitimate buying and selling of legitimate securities. You could strike out all the margin purchases and sales of the stock exchange, and while you would vastly decrease the amount of shouting and trading in the stock exchange room, you would not in the slightest degree limit bona fide business transactions. Indeed, you would increase legitimate transactions, because in the absence of an opportunity to gamble in margin transactions, you would add largely to the money available for actual purchases. Margin trading is the greatest source of panicky conditions. There is scarcely a time when the money owed on margin transactions is not equal or greater than the whole circulating medium of the United States. And unfortunately for the stability of the finances of the country in general, this money so owed is usually subject to payment on demand. As a rule the broker is liable to be required by the bank to pay on demand the loans that he has obtained in order to carry his numerous customers. The bank may notify the broker any morning that his loans must be paid before the close of that day's business, and what is the result? That single broker may notify hundreds, yes, thousands, of customers in the next few minutes that they must largely increase their margins (if not pay the whole sum), and thus the panic begins. The prairie has been set on fire, as it were. Many of the customers had been gambling to the extent of their last dollar in their original margins; others may be able to increase their margin for the first time, or second time, but ultimately they, too, drop out of the fight, the bank persists in calling its loans, the broker has no alternative except to throw his customers' stock upon the market for liquidation. Now, consider for one moment; there are about eleven hundred brokers on the New York Stock Exchange, and a dozen big banks can call hundreds of millions of dollars of loans in a single hour, and if the banks persist in calling the loans, the eleven hundred brokers spread the call each to their numerous customers. Defaulting customers multiply, volumes of stocks and bonds are thrown upon the market, and the panic is on. Legitimate securities have their values shattered, and are carried down by being in bad company on the stock exchange with worthless securities. It is the concentration of demand indebtedness giving the power to a few banks to call such a vast volume of loans on a day's notice that will forever give us an unstable financial condition so long as this power rests in a few hands; and to say that this power is not often abused, and for selfish purpose, is to dispute the truthful history of recent years. Will anybody pretend that the panic of December, 1899, had any legitimate cause or any cause in fact other than a desire on the part of one strong banking element to wreck another, and again, can anybody pretend that what was known as the Venezuela panic in 1895 occasioned by the remote possibility that President Cleveland's Venezuela message would provoke a conflict with Great Britain, would ever have been occasioned had the margin practice not been in existence? The second sober thought of the people left no cause for alarm whatever, but before that second thought, the bankers' power to call the vast amount of loans incident to margin trading on the stock exchange had wrecked legitimate as well as a vast volume of illegitimate business. And to say that the stock exchange is not a consumer of ready cash is to state the veriest nonsense. There has not been a time in years that a Wall street bank would consider a legitimate loan to a wholesale merchant or a manufacturer, or a bona fide grain or cotton dealer without first looking at the stock exchange ticker. If the pulse of the stock exchange was smooth and even, then the banker had money for legitimate lines of commerce, but if the ticker indicated a feverish condition of the stock exchange, the banker's answer was ready at once. It would be: 'Leave your cotton in the warehouse, leave your grain in the elevators; they won't spoil there.' To the merchant: 'Limit your trading; the ready cash can't be spared. The stock exchange may turn to the bad any minute, and our banks must be prepared for the emergency.' To say that the demands of Wall street, involving amounts greater than all the circulating medium in the United States, and authorized to demand the cash at any time, does not cripple legitimate business requires an argument much stronger than the mere assertion of the Wall Street Journal.

"In times of financial stress the stock exchange must be favored (they tell you) by giving it the first privilege in the use of cash 'to avoid a general financial calamity.' In times of peace it is favored again. It is then that the bankers demand 20 per cent interest for a loan secured with live stock, while they accept 2 per cent on a loan secured by watered stock.

"DAYS OF GRACE.

"Better termed days for calm reflection; would also work for stability in the financial world.

"Stop the pell mell grand rush, which is the finishing touch to the well-laid scheme of the gambler to corner or smash the market.

"The foolish war scare,—

"The premature frost in the west,—

"And like inspired influences made to order and which often unsettle finances from ocean to ocean would usually fall flat if the power to cap such climax by hasty action was limited.

"Remember one thing: We will never have stable financial conditions as long as the power is in the hands of a few men in a single city to call such vast amount of loans on short notice, no matter whether such action be inspired by fever occasioned by gambling, by foolish war scare, or by an effort to corner or smash the stock market.

"They say stock exchange speculation is essential to prosperity; yet they favored abolishing the Louisiana Lottery which was a game of chance, free from manipulation, and gave its patrons a fair gambler's chance for his money, and affected no one but patrons; and now they defend a gambling game subject to manipulation, and the effect of which controls the supply and rate of interest on money for every legitimate line of commerce.

"Let me give you an illustration of a class of stocks and bonds, which never should have had the credit of recognition by the New York Stock Exchange. While I do not claim to be better informed than many others, yet I have some knowledge of stock exchange methods and as affording an opportunity for bona fide dealing in legitimate securities, under legal control, and for cash, I am in favor of a stock exchange. But as an opportunity for displaying worthless goods and for gambling practices and margin transactions as it now exists, I am opposed to it.

"As an illustration, I want to use a company of which I also had some opportunity to know their methods and valuations. As a contractor for years, I was a considerable customer for the products of one of its subcompanies, and as a lawyer, I performed some services for a subcompany that familiarized me to some extent.

"I speak of the United States Steel Company. I do not know why they gave it the name of 'United States Steel Company,' other than that its purpose may have been to 'steal' from the whole United States.

"I also take this company as an example, because iron products have always been considered a leading staple in the manufacturer's line, as corn is in the agricultural line, and we used to hear our fathers say, that iron and corn went hand in hand. And the United States Steel Company is not an infant industry in the sense that we understand the word 'infant.' For it has a capitalization of over eight hundred million dollars of stock and nearly six hundred million dollars of bonds, outstanding, a total of fourteen hundred and forty million dollars, practically equal to half the circulating medium of the United States.

"What does this company own that gives it this tremendous value, or does it really have the value?

"Let us see:

"This company was created in 1901 for the purpose of becoming the owner of iron and steel manufacturing plants, properties, etc.

"It acquired the leading plants of the country until now it lists over one hundred and twenty plants, located in about a dozen different States of the Union. The purpose of acquiring these plants by one company was to destroy competition, create trusts (as it were), or monopoly, and thereby be able to control the price at which they would sell nails, wire, railroad rails and other iron products to the American consumer. Having thus monopolized practically all of the American mills they rely upon an import tariff law, passed by Congress, to shut out foreign competing mills.

"And what is the total value of these assets?

"In 1902, Mr. Schwab, then president of the United States Steel Company, was called on by a chancellor in New Jersey to prepare an inventory of the assets of this infant industry. After inflating the valuation of factories, mills, stock on hand, appurtenances, and so on (and including the cash in the treasury), to the highest degree that a sensible reading public might pass without criticism, he was was still seven hundred million dollars short of making the inventory valuation equal the amount of outstanding stock and bonds. A happy thought struck him and he made the two ends meet by saying with one stroke of the pen: 'Our ore lands are worth seven hundred millions of dollars.'

"Handy, wasn't it?

"He could have said twelve hundred million dollars, if it had been necessary.

"Schwab knew very well that these ore lands had not cost the schemers who created the company 5 per cent of seven hundred million dollars.

"TRUE INVENTORY.

"A true inventory at that time would have read about like this:

"Ore lands, mills, stock on hand, cash in the treasury, and every other thing of value, about four hundred and forty million dollars.

"Dingley Tariff Bill benefits, about ten hundred million dollars.

"That would have been a true inventory of the United States Steel Company assets, and yet the New York Stock Exchange gave faith and credit to these spurious issues of stocks and bonds, by admitting them to its list for trading purposes.

"The governmental authorities slept while this gigantic steal was going on and the lambs who bought the stock were being fleeced; even the United States mails were permitted to be used to scatter this destructive blast throughout the world. You will note there are two sides to a condition created by such practices. Through the medium of the stock exchange thousands of people throughout the world have become owners of these grossly inflated issues. Two-thirds of their value depends upon an unjust act of Congress that may be repealed at any day, for will any one pretend that when Congress is prepared to stand for the people's rights that this great company, which now sells a quantity of nails at $6.50 after a long shipment to foreign shores, shall be permitted to exact $10 for the same quantity of nails from the American farmer right at home. And when that wrong is righted and the United States Steel Company is denied the right to rob our people, what will become of the innocent purchasers who have invested in its inflated securities. One of two innocent parties must continue to suffer. Either the innocent purchasers of the United States Steel Company's stocks and bonds, from purchases made possible by a gambling stock exchange manipulated by the frenzied financiers who manufactured these issues, or a long-suffering public must continue to be robbed by tariff based on robbery only. And this is not a new subject. But a few short months ago this same United States Steel Company, which by the manipulation of its managers had boomed these stocks to tremendous prices, fell like an avalanche on legitimate finances, and in a few days showed an aggregate depletion of nearly a half billion dollars.

"Wall Street Journal, will you contend that a stock exchange that recognized and put its stamp of good faith upon such securities is a legitimate business enterprise, necessary to the welfare of honest finances?

"It can truly be said that the battle of Gettysburg spread sadness into fewer homes than did the decline in prices of the United States Steel Company's stocks, and that, while every scar on the field of Gettysburg was a badge of honor, these scars on Wall street were brands of disgrace and destruction.

"There is one comforting thought, however, and that is that there is one day in the year when the United States Steel Company is capable of putting a correct value on its assets, and that is the day when they value their property for taxation. Their last annual report says that their taxes for the year were $4,356,126. This is practically two-elevenths of 1 per cent of what they say their property is worth for stock exchange purposes. When we realize that about 2½ per cent is the usual amount that other folks pay for taxes on the value of their property, it leads us to suggest to the tax collector that it might be well to remind the United States Steel Company that they are either stealing from the tax authorities or they are misrepresenting their value on the stock exchange. True, the United States Steel Company shows a net earning of about $180,000,000 for last year, being about 12 per cent on their stock exchange value, or about 40 per cent on their actual value, about 100 per cent on the value they return for taxation, but who will take care of the day on Wall street when the Dingley tariff bill shall be so revised as to deprive this favored institution of its right to rob the American consumer of steel and iron products. That day will see another panic, whenever it comes, unless stringent laws shall have been passed placing the stock exchange under legal control, depriving it of the power to deceive the public through the dealing in spurious securities, destroyed margin dealings, wash sales, gambling, and every other practice except that of legitimate bona fide buying and selling of legitimate securities.

"Neither should the officers of companies whose stocks and bonds are listed on the stock exchange be permitted to deal in them. The recent instance of one in control of a great railroad property in the West secreting the financial conditions of his company and its ability and likelihood of dividend paying, to the end that he might profit by purchases of its stock, should be a sufficient object lesson, at least to those who suffered from his manipulation. And what is the practice of the great Wall street bankers? Is there 20 per cent of them who do not directly or indirectly deal on the stock exchange and whose personal profit can not be increased by either the restricted loaning of money from his bank to the margin traders or by the raising of interest rates or the calling of loans on the same people. If one of these bankers has made his bet that stock will fall in value, he has but to use his power as a banker to call loans or raise interest rates and he has won his bet; or, if he has bet that the price of stocks will advance, he has but to encourage the more liberal loaning of money and reducing of interest rates to brokers and he will win that bet. And in view of all these gambling manipulations, possibilities, and opportunities, when the chief schemer and manipulator, and in many instances the great banker, are one and the same person (or aggregation of schemers) and having the management of the stock exchange subject to their dictation, and the financial policy of the country under their thumb. What do you say, citizen of the producing class, to this stock exchange as it is now operated? A public necessity or a business calamity?

"Always bear in mind that we have in these great financial centers and among the wealthy class many men of honor and patriotic purpose, and who, when the time comes, will respond to the opportunity to create a legitimate stock exchange limited to legitimate purposes."

OKLAHOMA'S PRACTICAL PLAN TO SECURE ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE OF THE PEOPLE.

Governor Haskell is the first to commence action for a constitutional amendment under article 5 and calls the plan the "Oklahoma plan."

His Christmas greetings to Oklahoma follows:

THE PEOPLE'S CHRISTMAS GREETING.

"There has been plenty of talk. The Oklahoma policy is that actions speak louder than words.

"It is customary in many States at Christmas time to extend executive clemency to some State prisoner, but on this occasion I find no application for pardon ready for hearing under the law upon which I am at all satisfied that the pardoning power should be exercised; but after a conference, I am fully convinced that there is an opportunity to a certain extent to aid in liberating eighty millions of people.

"For years there has been much talk concerning the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, the same as we elect the governor and other State officers. This talk avails us nothing, and the time has come when we should either quit talking on the subject entirely or take appropriate action to secure definite results.

"To elect United States Senators by direct vote of the people the Constitution of the United States must be amended. We find there are two ways to propose amendments to the Constitution. One is for the United States Congress, by a two-thirds vote of both Houses, to provide for submitting the question of amendment to the several States of the Union.

"The other method of securing the submission to the States of an amendment to the Constitution is for two-thirds of the States of the Union through their legislatures, to requesting Congress to call a convention of the States for submission of amendments to the Constitution. Whereupon the Constitution of the United States says that Congress shall provide for such convention of States, and the submission of the amendments to the Constitution which such convention shall propose to the several States for their proper ratification, and in either event when the proposed amendment is submitted to the several States, if three-fourths of the States of the Union shall concur in the amendments, the Constitution of the United States thereby becomes so amended.

"For years the people have waited for the Congress of the United States to submit such an amendment to the Constitution; several times the House of Representatives at Washington has adopted the proper provision, but has never secured the concurrence of the Senate. Therefore, it is time that the second method be resorted to, and if action is taken in Oklahoma, and thirty other States of the Union join therein, Congress must then provide for the convention of all the States to formulate the amendment."

Governor Haskell says that beyond question a vast majority of the people of the United States desire to elect their Senators by direct vote of the people, and this desire has resulted in primary election laws, whereby fifteen of the States of the Union now recommend Senators to be elected by the legislature, but such action is only a recommendation to the legislature, and has no binding effect.

The governor, proceeding with action as a proper substitute for mere talk, has prepared a special message to the Oklahoma legislature, which will be ready for its consideration when it reconvenes after the holidays, respectfully requesting the legislature to adopt the following joint resolution:

"Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Oklahoma, in regular session of the legislature assembled:

"SECTION 1. That the Congress of the United States is requested to call a convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, pursuant to Article V thereof, and to provide the mode of ratification by the several States of the amendments so proposed.

"SEC. 2. That at said convention the State of Oklahoma will propose among other amendments that section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States should be amended to read as follows:

"'The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the electors thereof as the governor is chosen for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. They shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, the governor may make temporary appointments until the next regular election in such State. No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an elector of that State for which he shall be chosen. The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided. The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a president pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.'

"SEC. 3. There is hereby created a commission to be composed of the governor, and four members, to be appointed by him, who shall hold office during his pleasure, not more than two of whom shall belong to the same political party, to be known as the senatorial direct election commission of the State of Oklahoma. It shall be the duty of said commission to urge action by the legislatures of the several States and by the Congress of the United States to the end that a convention may be called as provided in section 1 hereof. The members of said commission shall receive no compensation.

"SEC. 4. This resolution properly authenticated shall be transmitted by the governor to the Congress of the United States and to the governor of each State in the Union."

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 26, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 25, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

UNITED STATES COURT AT DOTHAN, ALA.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17524.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17524) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Dothan, Ala.

The SPEAKER. The bill was read yesterday. Is there objection to its consideration? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. I desire to say a word or two before this bill shall pass. I find that this bill creates a new division of the district court of Alabama, in the middle judicial district, in which the court is now held at Montgomery. This bill creates a new division, which is composed of six counties, and provides that the court be held twice a year in the town of Dothan. The bill also contains a proviso that suitable rooms and accommodations be furnished for the holding of said court, free of expense to the Government, until the public building provided for by act of Congress is erected. There is something of a delusion in that clause. The last public building act provided for a post-office at Dothan, in the State of Alabama, at an expense of $40,000. Of course a court-house can not be built for any such sum. It simply means the building of a court-house at an expense of $150,000 and more in order to accommodate this new division of the court.

Now, there is a statement before the committee, made by the district attorney, in which he claims, on the basis of some indictments that were found the year before, that there would be a saving of $4,000 or $5,000 on witness fees by reason of having a court at Dothan; and that might be true, although it seems that the district attorney might have made a more detailed statement that would show the actual expense, and not the average number of witnesses that appeared in these trials.

What I object to in this sort of legislation is this: That when you get one division, immediately there is application for another. A judge has written me in regard to one State—there has been an application for a division which included only one county—of making a number of these divisions in judicial districts in his State; and the only result of that is that in these divisions the courts are not more frequently held than six months apart, or two courts in a year. If a man is indicted at one of these courts he can only proceed to trial in the subdivision where the crime is alleged to have been committed; so that he must wait for six months, even if he pleads guilty.

It presents the spectacle of a United States judge going around and holding court for a day or two in each one of these divisions scattered over the judicial district. I think this is a practice that ought not to obtain. I think, if I can have the consent of the House, I will put into the RECORD a letter I have lately received from a district judge in the State of Arkansas, wherein he fully sets out the evils of this latter-day tendency of Congress to create so many divisions, which have jurisdiction only over the kinds of cases that arise in those smaller divisions and the causes of actions there. It illustrates very well the evils that are growing up out of this practice, against which I protest. And I think that hereafter, unless there is a recommendation from the judge of that district, setting forth the reasons why it would be better to have an additional division, I shall feel in duty bound to object to this sort of legislation. I ask unanimous consent to print this letter in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York for the printing of the letter referred to?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
EASTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS, JUDGE'S CHAMBERS,
Little Rock, Ark., February 14, 1908.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with great interest what you said last Monday on the subject of establishing new divisional courts of the United States. These courts are very often established when there is no necessity whatever for them, at a great expense to the Government and great inconvenience, and in many instances injustice to litigants who are compelled to have their suits in these divisional courts.

Speaking for the district over which I have the honor to preside, I wish to give you the following facts: There are now three divisions in this district, the principal court being held at Little Rock, one at Helena, and a third at Batesville. Efforts have been made by residents of various counties in this district to have new divisions established and the court to be held in their city. I have been advised of efforts to have six new divisions made in this district at the present session of Congress. Fortunately the distinguished gentlemen who are Representatives in Congress from this State have in most instances inquired of me as to the necessity of these courts, and having been advised that there was no necessity for them they have not introduced some of the proposed bills. But it happens quite frequently that Representatives fear of offending their constituents if they fail to introduce and press these bills, with the result that new courts are established when there is no necessity whatever for them.

Let me give you the facts as they exist in this district. In some of the divisions which it was proposed to create at this session I found that in the last ten years there were less than ten civil suits instituted in the United States courts for this district against citizens of the proposed division, and the average has been about two criminal prosecutions a year in some of these divisions. We have now two divisional courts in addition to the court held in this city. The one at Helena is held twice a year; the average session of each term is four days. At Batesville the session usually lasts two days and sometimes three days. The trial of civil suits is usually postponed for one or two terms by reason of the fact that one of the parties is not ready for trial owing to the absence of witnesses, which means an additional delay of six or twelve months. If the suit is instituted and service of process had less than twenty days prior to the beginning of the term the cause has to be made returnable at the later term six months off. In criminal cases, with the exception of the cases in which the defendants desire to plead guilty, the trials have to be postponed until the next term, as the defendant claims that he has to procure witnesses, and they can not be obtained in time for that term unless the court should adjourn court from day to day until they can be served. The witnesses for the Government who testified before the grand jury are then required to appear at the next term at a great expense to the Government. If the defendant is unable to secure bail for his appearance at the next term or if he happens to be arrested and held by a United States commissioner two or three days after the court has adjourned at that place, and he is unable to give bail, he must remain in jail for six months, until the next term of court. Grand and petit juries have to be summoned for these courts at every term at an expense of from twelve to fifteen hundred dollars, each term lasting two or three days.

On the other hand, the court held at Little Rock is open practically all the time, except when the judge has to be absent attending the other courts. If a case can not be tried immediately it is postponed until a later day of the term. Defendants in criminal cases can be indicted and tried within a short time after they have had their examination before the United States commissioner. In civil suits, process being returnable twenty days after service regardless of terms, the cases can be tried within three months or less after the institution of the suit.

Another more serious objection to these numerous courts in every district is that it practically defeats the very object for which the national courts have been established. Nonresident litigants feel that jurors selected from a large district are not so apt to be prejudiced in favor of resident defendants as those residing either in the same county or adjoining counties in which the defendant resides, and with whom they are on friendly terms. If United States courts are to be established in divisions comprising only three or four counties the jurors of these courts would be practically the same men who serve as jurors in the State courts, thus defeating the very object which causes most of the nonresidents to seek redress in the national courts in preference to the courts of the State.

In my opinion, the committee to whom these bills are referred should inquire of the presiding judge of the district in which it is proposed to establish the new court of the advisability and necessity for such a court. They are familiar with the conditions existing and their opinion would assist the committee in reaching just conclusions.

We have now six national courts in the State of Arkansas, and the demand is, so far as I have been informed, for nine additional courts, although the present judiciary act has limited the jurisdiction of those courts to a great extent, and the legislature of this State has still more limited it by prohibiting foreign corporations doing business in this State from either instituting in or removing to the national courts causes to which they are parties, either as plaintiffs or defendants, under penalty of forfeiting their license to do business in this State. As the supreme court has sustained the validity of an act of that nature in Security Mutual Life Insurance Company v. Prewitt (202 U. S., 246), the effect of this legislation has caused a marked decrease in the litigation of the United States courts in this State. In fact, so great has been this decrease of business in these courts that I am often assigned to assist judges of the United States courts in other States in this circuit as the business here is not sufficient to keep me busy all the time.

Very respectfully, yours, JACOB TRIEBER, Judge.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. When it is proposed to create a division of one of these courts, who do you think is most competent to judge, the local Representative in Congress or the judge himself?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, the judge, by all means.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. To whom should this question be left?

Mr. PAYNE. The judge is, by all means, the most competent.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. You think we should establish courts for the convenience of the judge and not for the convenience and benefit of the people of the judicial district?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; but the judge has ample opportunity to see the needs and conditions in his judicial district.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It strikes me that the people and their Representative would be the proper ones to determine that.

Mr. PAYNE. Think of it! Half a dozen divisions and only one judge. A man is indicted to-day and the court adjourns. He is apprehended to-morrow. If he can not give bail he must wait a year, until there is another court held in that division, before he can come into court and show his innocence of the charge against him.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does not the gentleman know that throughout the South there are only two terms of the Federal court held in a year?

Mr. PAYNE. No; I do not know that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, it is a fact, even if the gentleman does not know it. They hold two terms a year, and not more than that.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not suppose that condition existed in any district in the United States.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Why certainly it does. It exists in every district.

Mr. PAYNE. If it does, it would be a great deal better to increase the number of terms of court, and not divide the district up into little divisions, where court can not be held frequently. I should not object to a reasonable increase in the number of the terms of court, and I should not criticise this bill if it provided simply for two additional terms of court at Dothan, where the litigants might appear and be given additional opportunities for the hearing of cases during the year. Of course, a court should be open at all times for the purpose of receiving a plea of guilty, if a prisoner, after he is apprehended, desires to present that plea. The court should be open at the place of residence of the judge, by an adjournment from time to time. There ought not to be any difficulty about that.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I notice the bill provides that suitable accommodations and rooms shall be furnished without expense to the United States until the public building provided for by act of Congress shall be erected. I take it that a public building has been provided already by act of Congress.

Mr. CLAYTON. At the last session of Congress an appropriation was made for a public building.

Mr. MANN. Was the holding of this court then contemplated, or will that require an enlargement of the public building or an increase in its cost?

Mr. CLAYTON. I can not tell the gentleman about that, because I have not seen the plans and specifications of the building, and I have not consulted with the authorities having that matter under consideration.

Mr. MANN. Then it is not the gentleman's present intention to follow this bill up with a proposition to increase the size and cost of the public building already provided for, using this as a basis?

Mr. CLAYTON. In view of the statement I have made in the hearing of the gentleman, I hardly think that is a fair question.

Mr. MANN. I did not hear distinctly what the gentleman said, but it seems to me to be a fair question. I do not want to bind the gentleman as to what he shall do in the future.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will say to the gentleman in all frankness that I shall do just what the gentleman would. I shall get as many public buildings and the best public buildings in my district that it is possible to get. I think that is fair.

Mr. MANN. Of course we all know that, but I think the gentleman, in all frankness, ought to say to the House whether it is his present intention to use the passage of this bill as an argument for an increased cost of a public building already provided for.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is quite likely that I will. I am frank with the gentleman, and I hope my answer is satisfactory. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to make any remarks. This bill comes from the committee with a unanimous report. The bar and the people down there want it; it is for the convenience of the citizens, and will save the Government $4,000 to $5,000 annually, according to the district attorney's statement, and will be of public convenience and will save many thousands of dollars to the people who have business in the court. I do not sympathize with the idea of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that we should keep the courts away from the people. I think the courts afford a means of spreading public intelligence and of inculcating a spirit of love of the law and of justice. I do not know of anything that has done more good in this country than the holding of court where the people see justice administered.

I know nothing of conditions in Arkansas to which the gentleman refers. We are not considering any case there. This is a bill to meet conditions in Alabama and has the approval of an important committee of this House charged with the duty of reporting to the House proper and necessary legislation. Perhaps it would be well for all judges to attend to their own business. Some have achieved fame by that course.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to print a statement in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILEY. To offer an amendment. I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "Covington" wherever it occurs in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the bill, wherever it occurs, the word "Covington."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

STREET RAILWAY EXTENSION.

The Speaker laid before the House the bill (S. 902) authorizing certain extensions to be made of the lines of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company, the Washington Railway and Electric Company, the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, and the Capital Traction Company, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with a House amendment disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. CAMPBELL, and Mr. SIMS.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Army. And pending that, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] if we can not agree on some time when general debate shall be closed.

Mr. HAY. I think so.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HAY. Three hours and a half on this side.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Can not that be cut down a little?

Mr. HAY. I do not think it can; I have already made promises for that amount of time, and I would not like to break them.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have no idea that we will use three hours and a half on this side, but I will ask unanimous consent that general debate shall be closed in seven hours, providing that if it be concluded sooner we shall proceed with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that general debate shall be closed in seven hours, providing that if it be closed sooner the reading of the bill may be begun.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. And in connection with that, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time between the two sides shall be equally divided, one half to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The SPEAKER. That order was made yesterday.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That was only made for yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman also asks that the time shall be equally divided between himself and the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will say that general debate will undoubtedly take all of to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Iowa if this takes into account the time that was used yesterday?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; I understand it takes into account from now on.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. HULL of Iowa was then agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a correction as to the amount carried in this bill for the increased pay of the Army. I have here an estimate sent me on the 20th of February by the Department in which the increased pay of the Army under the bill, as reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, was given as $4,940,560. I stated yesterday in round numbers $5,000,000. I am in receipt this morning of a revised estimate from the Paymaster-General's Department, giving the entire increased pay accorded by this bill, if the provision shall be adopted, as $3,973,000, a very large decrease from the amount I stated yesterday. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] suggests that it has to be added to the bill. I have stated if this provision were adopted it would increase the appropriation about $5,000,000. I state now on the revised estimates that if the provisions are adopted the increase will be below $4,000,000. In other words, they made a mistake of over $1,000,000 in the estimates submitted on the 20th of February. Of course the House understands that if the provisions submitted for increased pay of the enlisted force go out of the bill there will be no increase whatever to the bill on this account, and these increases are only given on the theory that the House will adopt the provisions reported from the committee.

I desire to give notice at this time that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] will discuss the bill proper, and Army matters, as soon as the first gentleman accorded time on the side of the minority concludes his remarks.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, among the delightful recollections of the Fifty-ninth Congress there stands out conspicuously the eloquent speeches and the learned arguments made upon the floor of this House. The range of legislative activity was such as to involve the necessity for scrutinizing and analyzing practically every governmental function and faculty. It was a historic session. As has been the case, I suppose, since the beginning of the Republic, many matters not immediately before the body for legislative action were argued and discussed. One of these was the tariff question. The demand for a revision of existing schedules coming up from the various sections of the country, coming not only from those individuals who opposed the policy of protectionism, but coming as well from the interests and associations and individuals who have favored it, while they received here no legislative recognition, were yet accorded a respect somewhat in keeping with their dignity and importance. It was realized that that question was before the country; that it was eliciting earnest consideration and patriotic attention, and it resulted that the strongest leaders in thought and activity on both sides of this Chamber took part in the discussion in regard to it. While it was somewhat in the nature of a dress-parade drill, in that the question was never directly before the body for legislative action, yet it was such a drill as to call for the most potent artillery, and the very heaviest guns were put in action. The results of the succeeding election made no change in the party management in this House, and so, therefore, that question, with its attendant refinements and consequences, is still before the country, as it will be, Mr. Chairman, until there is a change in party management.

I have not arisen, however, for the purpose of making a tariff speech at this time. At some future time I may ask permission to do so, because I am of those who hold fast to the belief that this matter of the manipulation of the taxing power of the Government—aside from certain constitutional questions going to the governmental structure and power—presents the most delicate, the most far-reaching, and the most pregnant issue of American politics.

But I have risen, Mr. Chairman, at this time rather to call attention to the existence of a condition which, because of past teaching and an association of ideas, is inevitably to have a bearing upon this tariff question, and that, sir, is the condition of industrial depression following the panic of October, 1907. Just what bearing this condition ought to have upon the settlement of the tariff question will of course be determined by each voter according as his reason or his prejudice may incline him. I pass by that specific phase also and venture to call attention to another.

Mr. Chairman, the party now in power, by the words of its past platforms, by the speeches of its eminent leaders, has deliberately, persistently, and incessantly saturated the public thought of this country with the idea that this Government is an entity properly paternal; that the taxing power of the Government, given it in order that it might sustain itself despite State caprice and whim, may be manipulated not alone, not immediately, for the purpose of raising revenue, but to serve as a shield and a shelter to such interests as are sufficiently fortunate as to gain the legislative favor against competition from like interests and industries lying without the governmental domain.

That party has gone further than that. It has taught the people that unless this force was so exercised, so manipulated, economic conditions would be uncertain and unsound and industrial advancement could not be hoped for. It has gone still further, Mr. Chairman. It has taught the converse of this latter proposition. It has taught the people that if this were done, if the taxing power were so manipulated, then financial stamina was sure and commercial prosperity unfailing.

And it is this logic which looms before that party now to strike it with confusion and to thrill it with despair.

Many years ago the late James G. Blaine in a great campaign speech made, if I remember correctly, to a league of Republican clubs in the city of New York, entered into a discussion of the relation between political parties and industrial conditions, and in that speech he ingeniously, adroitly, and elaborately laid down the proposition that the application of the protective policy had always been followed by prosperous industrial conditions and the application of the principles of those opposed to that policy has been followed by depression. Whether Mr. Blaine was the first to elaborate this idea I do not know, but certain it is that from that day to last October that idea has been the fundamental and organic idea of every Republican platform and of every Republican campaign speech made here or elsewhere throughout the Republic.

I know, sir, that generalizations in regard to great social movements are always likely to be erroneous; but I think it can be safely asserted that the Republican organization through the whole of its life has had just three fundamental campaign arguments. I do not mean three at any one time, but one at each of its three different stages. The party first came into power by an affiliation with the antislavery sentiment of the country. In the second stage it maintained its power by an appeal to the heroic memories and the intense but inevitable passions that were engendered by the war in which slavery was abolished. When, however, the passions began to be dissipated and prejudice began to give way and men came to view public questions in the light of cold, calm, dispassionate reason, Republican supremacy was immediately threatened and at length overthrown.

Then, sir, came the third step and the third argument with which we of this generation are so familiar, that Democratic success means adversity and Republican success means prosperity.

The Republican platform of 1888 foreshadowed this. The platform of 1892 hinted at it, but it was not until 1893 that the argument was worked out to its full force.

In that year a Democratic Administration, the first after 1856, was inaugurated following the election in November, 1892. Prior to its inauguration a panic had occurred, with resulting industrial depression. This panic, in fact, had its beginnings in 1890, continued through successive years, and fell with the heaviest force and fury in 1893 and 1894. Straightway adroit and ingenious Republican leaders began to reduce the prosperity argument to a science. Speeches here were filled with it. The party platforms contained that as the practical statement of their case; a partisan press took it up. Those publications, run in the immediate interest of those associations desiring protectionism, began to carry it in black-faced type. The campaign text-books, put forth for the mental illumination, if not for the spiritual uplifting of the spellbinders, were teeming with it, and from the great auditoriums in the centers of population where the leaders spoke, down to the rural schoolhouses where the humbler, if not less hungry, orators shed the effulgence of their intellectual light upon the pathway of the voter, there rang out just one cry, "Republican success means prosperity; Democratic success means adversity."

That argument was effective. By force of it a Republican House was elected in 1894 and a Republican President in 1896, and, the party being restored to power, the Dingley bill was placed upon the statute books; and from that day until last autumn that argument has been at once that party's buckler and its shield, its cloud by day and its pillar of fire by night. When has the party, as a party, ever met another issue squarely? In 1896, when the question of silver coinage was the issue, you gentlemen on that side put into your platform an impossible proposition about international agreement, not because you favored it, but in order to avoid the humiliation of eating the words that you had spoken in 1888, and went forth to battle crying, "Enact a new tariff law, open the mills and not the mints." [Applause on the Democratic side.] When the delicate questions growing out of the Spanish-American war arose you cried out, "Why, what is imperialism? We have made the country prosperous." What care you for constitutional abstraction, what care you for organic limitations, what care you for all this talk about the consent of the governed? It is true that men have died for that from the time when the rude men in the German forests raised their shields and elected their tribal chiefs and leaders, but after all it is a mere abstraction. "We have filled the dinner pails and made you prosperous. We are the Government, the paternal Government. Eat, drink, and be merry for to-morrow you may die."

Daddy killed a blind bull,
Human natur', human natur';
Mammy fried a panful,
Sop and 'tatur, sop and 'tatur.

[Laughter and applause.]

I repeat, that argument was effective. Through force of it the party was restored to power and has retained that power. And this brings me, sir, back again to the condition stated in the beginning that now confronts the country in general and the Republican party in particular.

I have no intention, Mr. Chairman, of entering now into any anaylsis of the recent panic and the present industrial condition. You gentlemen upon that side may do that when you choose. I have not seen any very great hurry to enter into an analysis on that side. That may excite some wonder at first, but upon reflection it can occasion no very great surprise, because I think it would be difficult to find where the Republican party or the Republican leadership has ever attempted to analyze any panic in public. You have sought rather to fix in the public mind the idea that it occurred at a time which suited your purposes, and have chosen to let causes take care of themselves.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when I speak of the condition as a new condition confronting the Republican party, I do not mean just simply the occurrence of a panic under Republican Administration. That would not be true. As a matter of fact every panic and every industrial depression since 1860 has come with the Republican party in power and with Republican legislation upon the statute books. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That this is true of the panic of 1893, so-called, has been so often said that it is useless to reiterate it now. In fact, this has been admitted by our Republican friends, but they have always coupled the admission with the statement, "Ah, but a Democratic Administration had been elected and, therefore, the business men of the country were alarmed because of anticipation." When this has been replied to by pointing to the indisputable evidence that the panic of 1893, so-called, in fact had its beginnings in November, 1890, just a few weeks after the McKinley law went upon the statute books, then you gentleman on that side have responded, "Well, admitting that, the election of November, 1890, had been held, and that was the midterm election, and through all the history of the country that midterm election has been the invariable and infallible prophecy of what was to occur at the succeeding Presidential election, and the business interests of the country, being wise to this fact, having a knowledge of political astrology, being versed in the divination of the political stars, became alarmed then because they knew that, according to infallible prophecy, a Democratic Administration was to come in 1892." That, I believe, is the limit, the extreme limit, to which the argument has gone.

Well, sir, the specific condition which confronts the country now is that we may follow you, gentlemen, even to that extreme of folly and ridiculousness, and still you are speared by your own logic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, in October, 1907, the blessed Dingley tariff bill was on the statute books. Not one sacred schedule had been touched. The midterm election of 1906, that election which you say is the infallible prophecy of what is to occur at the succeeding Presidential election, had been held, and it had resulted in returning to this House an overwhelming Republican majority. A Republican President sat in the White House, a President who has never threatened the protective tariff. The President, amid his multitudinous activities, has displayed a warm desire, for which he has been often commended, to control predatory wealth. He has had much to say of the imposition of an inheritance tax in order to prevent the accumulation of tremendous estates, but nothing to say about beginning at the other end and preventing that legislative manipulation by the favoritism of which so many of these tremendous estates have been and are being accumulated. The President has greatly exercised himself in the matter of topping the predatory tree, but has not yet evidenced a willingness to lay the ax at the root of the tree.

The country knew then that such was the stand-pat sentiment of the Senate that even the little Philippine tariff bill, permitted to go through by the stand-patters here, was sleeping the eternal sleep in the pigeonholes of the said Senate's Committee on Finance. The country knew who was to be Speaker of the present Congress, and knew what his sentiments were, because he had openly and frankly avowed them; knew what the sentiments of the Committee on Ways and Means would be.

The country knew that there could not by any possibility be any "tinkering with the tariff" before 1909, and not then if that midterm election prophecy, in whose infallibility you say the business interests of the country had such confidence in 1890, remained true. Because you know, and the country is beginning to know, that there never was a dream so hopeless, that there never was a hope so baseless, as that there would be a tariff revision under a Republican Administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You have intimated that you would, you have said that you might, but always you have said, "Wait, wait, wait." [Aplause on the Democratic side.]

How long shall we wait? [Applause.] Oh, wait until Calpurnia has sweeter dreams! [Laughter.] Why, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the floor leader of the Republican party, ventured to guess the other day that there would be revision at the short session of the present Congress, because of the necessity for a minimum and a maximum. Tariff revision at a short session of Congress! Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, there will be tariff revision at the first session, the first long session, of the Sixty-first Congress, by a Democratic House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Well, sir; such was the political condition in October, 1907. Not only that; Providence had not deserted the people. The rains had fallen and the sun had shone and the labors of mankind had been blessed with abundance of elemental, fundamental wealth. The needs of the people had expanded; the volume of business had increased; values had risen; all seemed clear and bright and delightful; but suddenly somewhere something stopped. What was it? What could it have been under an unthreatened Dingley tariff? Well, you gentlemen can tell when you get ready. For the present it is important to remember what it was not. It was not a failure of crops. Oh, no. It was not a Democratic Administration; it was not even an anticipation of Democratic Administration according to your political astrology and your divination of the political stars. Just somehow, some way, something stopped. The banks closed their doors or kept open just to do one the courtesy of telling him that he could not get his own money on his own check. They had to do it, let it be said. I mean no criticism of the banks for it. I think locking the stable before the horse is gone is a good policy. But why had they to do it under a Republican Administration, which means prosperity, without any threat of a Democratic Administration, which means adversity? [Applause.] Builders and joiners climbed down from unfinished houses, oiled their saws and chisels and planes, and laid them away to await the coming of better days. Brick masons put away their trowels; stonecutters put away their tools; the hod carriers took a clearing-house certificate and went to hunt another job. [Laughter and applause.]

Painters oiled their brushes and laid them aside and joined the ranks of the idle and unemployed upon the streets. Unemployed men under the operations of an unthreatened Dingley bill! [Applause on the Democratic side.] Farmers hauled their produce to market, or what had been a market, and then hauled it back again because there was nothing there to buy it with. Merchants failing to collect their accounts closed their doors; the jobbers failing to get their accounts from the merchants closed their warehouses. Manufacturers failing to collect their accounts from the merchants and receiving no new orders, closed their establishments. Smokestacks ceased to belch forth their black currents, and over the land arose the pale steam of the charity soup house. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] All, Mr. Chairman, with the Republican party intrenched in every citadel of the Republic, with an unthreatened Dingley tariff bill in effect and with no Democratic Administration in esse or in expectancy.

Oh, Republican Administration means prosperity; Democratic success means disaster! [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in the beginning of these remarks I alluded to the great speeches made upon the floor of this House two years ago, in the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress. It seems particularly appropriate just now to give some more specific attention to some of these. Of course, sir, one can not begin to review them all nor to review all of any one.

There was the prosperity speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], that formidable, forceful, brave man, of whom I frequently think as "a setting out of the age of Rome," the best and purest age of Rome. Mr. Chairman, his strong and earnest efforts on that day I have no doubt were a potent influence in controlling the results of the succeeding election. But he can not repeat that speech now. Great as it was, it was based on an evanescent condition which has passed away. [Applause.]

Then there were the several prosperity speeches of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], a gentleman who comprehends within himself so many of the virtues of distinguished men of the past—the bearing of a Chesterfield, the pen of a Sallust, or an Addison, or a Steele, his lips sweet with the honeyed eloquence that blew through the Athenian groves. He spoke then of Republican prosperity and Democratic panic. He does not speak now of Republican panic. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] He confines his classic efforts now to nominating a candidate for President, to the end that he may enjoy the experience of an inglorious defeat. [Laughter and applause.] I wonder why the gentleman has not spoken of prosperity now? I think perhaps the solution may be found in this which I will read. In a dispatch sent forth by the United Press Association a few days ago there was this:

CHICAGO, February 11, 1908.

Never in the history of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society has there been such a demand for assistance as at the present time, is the claim of Superintendent Kingsley, who is in charge of the distribution of the funds by the Business Men's Relief Committee, which has just raised between $25,000 and $30,000 for needy families. "Never in the history of the society have we had so many appeals based entirely on lack of employment."

But it is Democratic Administration that means adversity, while Republican Administration means prosperity! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Then, Mr. Chairman, there was the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. One thinks of him as the Marshal Ney of protectionism, the distinguished lieutenant who led in the victory at Elchingen, who will pit his bold heart and his brave intellect in the rear van and be the last to cross the bridge into Paris upon protectionism's retreat from Moscow, and who will lead the last charge of the "old guard" at protectionism's Waterloo. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He spake then unto the people, and when he reached the climax of his splendid peroration he said:

We do not read our tariff lessons out of books. We read them by the blazing light of open furnace doors, amid the noise of industrial activities, and in the sweat of our brows that we coin into wealth. And God help the man or the party that would put out those fires, still the music of that noise, and send the workman home to a foodless and a hungry household.

Well, sir, I take it that last sentence could have but one meaning, and that is that a party, in the opinion of the gentleman, could put out those fires, could still the music of that noise, could send the workman home to a foodless and a hungry household, and, conversely, that it could prevent those things occurring.

The other day, sir, I read this:

CITY CARES FOR IDLE—PITTSBURG WILL GIVE $400,000 IN WAGES TO UNEMPLOYED.

PITTSBURG, February 1, 1908.

A special bond issue of $200,000 by the city of Pittsburg to give employment to its thousands of idle workers on the streets and in the parks was to-day decided on, and a special meeting of councils to pass the bond ordinance has been called for next Tuesday afternoon.

In 1893, during a financial stringency, a similar move was made, thousands of former business men working on the streets and in the parks at $1 per day. In view of the much higher rates of food now it has been decided to pay the unemployed $1.75 per day.

It is understood that there have been so many applications for work from citizens not employed for the past many weeks that it has been decided by the city fathers to take immediate steps toward giving food and money to the people who are willing to work.

It has been decided that another issue of $200,000 will follow the first in case it is seen that such a move is needed.

From subsequent notices in the Pittsburg papers, Mr. Chairman, I see that the first issue of $200,000 has been made, and on the day it became effective 6,000 men were there clamoring for work. I have not learned what was done in regard to the rate of wages, but it is to be hoped that in view of the increased price of food products under Republican Administration the good Democratic mayor out there has exerted his influence toward paying them $1.75 per day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURKE. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that the conditions in Pittsburg are due to the Dingley tariff bill?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, I do not know about that. That is for you and your party to say.

Mr. BURKE. That is what we want to ascertain—where the gentleman places the blame for the conditions that exist to-day.

Mr. GARRETT. Was the condition of 1893 due to the Wilson bill? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURKE. The condition of 1893, as is known all over this country, and especially in the city of Pittsburg, was due to the grave apprehension aroused on the part of the business and industrial establishments in the city of Pittsburg and in other cities throughout this country as a result of a Democratic victory. Now, since the gentleman has quoted from the city of Pittsburg, let me ask him what he has to say to this condition, and I quote from a Democratic paper——

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, if I can have time——

Mr. BURKE. I beg your pardon, of course, but this applies directly to the gentleman's statement regarding my own city.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman, certainly, but I hope he will be as considerate as he can in regard to my time.

Mr. BURKE. Well, the gentleman is explaining the condition in the city of Pittsburg, and I should like to have him explain this——

Mr. GARRETT. I will not yield to the gentleman to let him read anything. The gentleman can read it in his own time and explain it.

Mr. BURKE. I should like to have the gentleman explain to the House the origin or cause of the condition that exists in the city of London, and in every other industrial city in England to-day, where every workhouse is filled with idle people, and where the Dingley law is not in force.

Mr. GARRETT. That is what we begged your party to do in 1893 in regard to Australia and every other country, and you would not do it. The burden is on you. You covenanted to keep the people prosperous and you have broken that covenant. Go out and tell them why. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, I saw the other day that the net earnings of the United States Steel Corporation, of which, if I mistake not, Pittsburg is the center, for October, 1907, was $17,052,211; for November of that year it dropped to $10,467,253, and in December it had fallen to $5,034,531. I am not certain, but I think the December earnings were the very smallest of any month since the steel trust was organized.

Why? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] is asking me why. Let him and his party tell why. The Dingley tariff bill was the law of the land. Its blessings were dropping like manna from heaven. It was in no danger; it was not threatened. The Democratic party did not close any furnace doors; it did not still the music of the industrial strife; it did not send workmen to a foodless and hungry household.

Strange, isn't it, Mr. Chairman, since Republican Administration means prosperity and Democratic Administration means disaster! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Then, there was the speech of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN]. I make no effort to compare or liken him to any man out of the setting of the past. Of course, there was a certain lean and hungry Cassius not unknown to fame. [Laughter.] But, unless it be in personal appearance, my friend from Washington in no way resembles that historic character, because Cassius was a misanthrope, and the gentleman from Washington is anything but that. I leave him in a class by himself, unique, dominating, supreme—himself a standard by which to measure. He made a great speech here two years ago. I doubt if one can find in all the RECORD any single speech which dressed the prosperity argument more attractively for campaign purposes than did that of the gentleman from Washington. It will always be interesting, and there are parts of it that are particularly interesting just now. None is more so, Mr. Chairman, than that portion which he himself declared embodied the idea he was most anxious to emphasize. He said:

> If I don't accomplish anything else in the course of these few desultory remarks, I would like to lodge one thought firmly in the minds of all who hear me, and that thought is that things in this world do not happen by accident. Events in the economic and industrial world do not occur by chance or accident.

He elaborated and illustrated this thought, and amid applause on that side of the Chamber applied it to the protective tariff and the policy of "standing pat." The old arguments of Blaine and the old expressions of the platforms were put by the gentleman from Washington in a different style.

I can imagine, sir, with what profound feelings of pain the gentleman from Washington, believing, as he does, in the power of legislation to prevent panics, contemplates the industrial depression of to-day, and how he must, in his sympathetic heart, curse the stupidity which could not, or the folly which would not, detect the storm and prevent it, as it could have been prevented, if his logic is right, by "brains and by energy, by wisdom and by foresight." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Upon that basis, sir, it would be very easy to lay the blame for present conditions upon the Republican party, because it is capable of proof that that party has energy, and it admits without demanding proof—waives its constitutional rights—and admits that it has brains and wisdom and foresight. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Washington told us how fortunate it was that during the panic Administration of Cleveland he lived at a place on the Pacific coast, where there was an abundance of clams, and he pledged us his honor that during that Administration he ate clams and ate clams and ate clams until his stomach rose and fell with the ebb and flow of the tide. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Washington perhaps could do the country a service now, and probably encourage emigration to his State, if he is able to rise and say that the clam prospects are good now under this Republican prosperity Administration. [Laughter.]

I fear, however, that they are not so good this year, or have not been well advertised, because I heard the other day that 1,500 men recently marched upon the city hall in the city of Seattle, in that State, asking for work and for bread, and, according to popular belief, as I was informed, some of the more desperate of those hungry men, failing to get work and bread, pressed out to a little near-by town—Everett, I believe the name was—and robbed the post-office.

Unemployed men, made desperate by hunger—

> They shiver with cold and they cower in dread
> In the dark and the damp of the night,
> Their faces pinched and their fingers thin,
> Their features marred with want and sin
> And the heartless, hopeless fight.
> God's name to them not hallowed;
> His will not done and His kingdom dead;
> A crumb or a crust their daily bread.

But Republican Administration, of course, means prosperity and Democratic Administration means adversity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I guess there's no sign of a sawmill company hanging on that telephone pole in Centralia asking for men to work now. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If that pole was half cut down by whittlers in 1893, under Democratic panic Administration, I fear it may be finished now under Republican prosperity Administration, and we shall see what vote every gash will represent in this good year.

That banner which floated from that pole, then 262 feet long—1 foot for every million dollars of gold bonds issued by a Democratic panic Administration—has it been preserved, I wonder? If so, it can be shortened and used again this year to represent the sixty-two millions of gold bonds and certificates issued by the Republican prosperity Administration.

Confidence? Oh, yes. Depression—that is Democracy. Prosperity—that is Republicanism. Bonds in time of peace! Gold bonds! Interest-bearing gold bonds in time of profound peace to restore confidence! [Applause on the Democratic side.] Confidence in what? In the Dingley bill? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, taking them all in all, I believe the most attractive of the prosperity speeches was that by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS].

That speech was martial and militant. The bugle call was in every sentence. It deserved "to be sung with the throat of the whirlwind"—and it was. It is easy to liken him to a character "out of the setting of the past." He reminds one irresistibly of that young Spartan king who when his enemies demanded his arms replied:

> Come and take them.

I remember, sir, with what dramatic force the gentleman from Indiana displayed here a picture of Coxey's army of unemployed when they surrounded this Capitol in 1894. This came to my memory with peculiar force the other day when I read that the unemployed—I think of the city of St. Louis—were counseling the wisdom of another march upon this capital and were in communication with Coxey with a view of having him lead them. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman from Indiana boldly staked his case and the case of his party upon the condition of prosperity and the proposition that the "Dingley bill had done the business." His speech was predicated upon a sign which he saw in the city of Cincinnati as he came on here that year, hanging in front of an employment bureau's office, saying, in large letters:

> All kinds of work for all kinds of men.

The Dingley bill "was doing the business."

Mr. Chairman, I had occasion a short time ago to pass through Cincinnati, and I regret profoundly to have to report that the Dingley bill is not doing the business now. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It abides with us, and you gentlemen on that side abide with it, but that sign has passed away. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Instead, sir, what do we hear from Cincinnati? Senator FORAKER, of Ohio, made a speech not long ago at a banquet in New York. The papers reported him as saying, among other things:

> A few days ago an officer of one of the mercantile agencies of that city stated that there were on that day, according to their reports, 30,000 idle men in Cincinnati.

The gentleman from Indiana undertook to tell us what would have happened had that sign he saw been posted anywhere in the United States during the Cleveland panic Administration. Some day when the gentleman chooses he can tell us what would happen if it were posted now during the Republican prosperity Administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not think, sir, he can find finer language than he used then, and to save him the trouble I will borrow it and tell you now. It would be—

Set to music and sung from every hilltop in the Republic.

I remember the bold challenge he flung to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] that if Mr. RAINEY had an unemployed man in his district, he, Mr. LANDIS, would go home and get him a good job at good wages within twenty-four hours.

Will the gentleman open an employment bureau now? Will he make good? Will he deliver the job? If he will, Mr. Chairman, his name shall be set to music and sung from every hilltop in the Republic. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Freight cars and engines representing an investment of $400,000,000 standing idle, and 30,000 idle men, the discharged crews of the idle equipment; sixty-five steam shovels belonging to the largest contracting firm in the South standing idle rusting in the Southern rains, and 25,000 men lately employed by that firm looking for other jobs.

Is the Dingley bill doing the business? Does Democratic Administration mean adversity and Republican success prosperity? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Oh, gentlemen of the Republican side, you have reached a new era. This dilemma confronts you: Either you must deny the truth of the teachings with which you have saturated the thought of this country for fifteen years, that an industrial depression occurring while a party is in power is due to that party, or you must assume the responsibility for the present industrial and financial holocaust. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If you do the former, if you eat the words you have spoken for fifteen years, if you concede that your platform utterances and your campaign speeches were intended as mere vote-catching buncombe, that you were opportunists, that you predicated your case upon the belief that you could deceive the American voter—if you concede that, then may God be with you when the November day of wrath shall come. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If you do the other, if you accept the responsibility, then the results are for you too dreadful, and for us too good to contemplate. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You covenanted with the people of the United States to keep them prosperous. If it was a silly covenant, yours is the blame. If it was an insincere covenant, yours is still the blame. If it was sincere, it was silly; if it was insincere, it was criminal. But you made your bed; lie in it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not think you will lie out of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You have sown the wind. Oh, how much wind you have sown! Now reap the whirlwind. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You have taught the people to pray to the Republican party, but now, in the light of recent conditions, when they begin to pray, they approach you even as did the old colored man down in my country, who approached the throne of grace, saying: "Oh, thou all-sufficient, self-sufficient, insufficient God." [Applause on the Democratic side.] You have got to learn a new speech. During your first era your argument was prayer. During the next stage it was praise and prejudice. During the next stage it was prosperity. What is the next to be? It has to be something new.

There is no slavery to abolish now except that which you have not yet abolished in the Philippines. You may bring tears by an appeal to heroic memories and cheers by an appeal to any slumbering passion, if any there be, which I doubt, remaining from the war of secession, but you can not get votes that way.

You dare not sacrifice your President upon the altar. He has a prejudice against being sacrificed, and though many of you would like to do it, you have not the courage of your soreness. The industrial depression of 1893 will be no more a vicarious atonement for your party's sins, and the charity soup house will be for you no more a means of saving grace. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We wait, gentlemen, with interesting anticipation the birth of the new thought. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4632. An act for the relief of the Davison Chemical Company of Baltimore, Md.

S. 5330. An act for the relief of the Mille Lac band of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes.

S. 5333. An act relating to yachts.

S. 5507. An act to increase the membership of the Philippine Commission.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to have read as an appendix to the very eloquent speech of the gentleman from Tennessee the following article from a Democratic newspaper of Wednesday, February 19.

Mr. BURKE. What paper?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is a reprint in the Washington Post of an article in the New York American. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] The article is from the New York American, a distinguished Democratic newspaper. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York American.]

BUYERS SPENDING MILLIONS—THOUSANDS OF MERCHANTS FROM THE WEST TALK OF RETURNING PROSPERITY.

Ten thousand business men and women from the West and Southwest are in town spending, it is estimated, $100,000,000. They have driven pessimism from the great downtown jobbing district with stories of assured prosperity and are spreading joy and cash among the hotels, theaters, and other amusement places.

This is the annual buying period for the spring trade, and reduced rates on the railroads are bringing merchants here from the small towns in far-away Texas, as well as from Chicago, St. Louis, and the big centers. The registration at the Merchants' Association is within a hundred odd of the phenomenal registration last spring, when prosperity was at its height. Up to yesterday nearly 2,000 buyers or their representatives, about one-half of whom are women, had registered. They are coming in at the rate of nearly 200 a day. As only a portion take advantage of the special railroad rates, it is estimated that the total number of buyers at present here is about 10,000.

Every hotel that caters to the out-of-town custom is crowded, the big hotels have all they can handle, and the family hotels are turning hundreds of people away. The buyers are being entertained at clubs, dinner parties, theaters, and with automobile trips by the merchants who are receiving the benefit of their trade.

S. C. Mead, secretary of the Merchants' Association, said yesterday of the influx of buyers:

"It means that the country is all right. The men who are coming to New York now to lay in their spring stocks are mainly from the West and Southwest. I have not heard one of them talk about hard times. They laugh at the idea, and I tell you their optimism is having a big effect here in New York. Our merchants rather had the idea that trade was going to be dull this spring, but they have changed their opinion in the past few days. Buyers have registered here from towns of not over 1,000 population in Texas, the new State of Oklahoma, and the entire Southwest, as well as from Chicago, St. Louis, Indianapolis, Detroit, and other big cities.

"The most encouraging reports are brought from Texas, Oklahoma, and Arkansas, where the crops have been good. I have been surprised at the number of new faces and have been told that scores of new business houses are springing up."

In the shops of the H. B. Claflin Company, Tefftweller, C. B. Rouss, the Chelsea Trading Company, and others extra employees have been hired to take care of the increased trade. There has also been a boom in the mail-order business, while reports from commercial travelers are to the effect that conditions are as good as they were this time last year.

Alexander Bombard, representing one of the largest houses in Galveston, Tex., said:

"We have had splendid crops down in our State, and we have no patience with hard-time talk. I am here to purchase one of the largest orders for expensive dry goods that our house has ever put in. Texans have money to spend, and they are going to spend it this spring. My advice to New Yorkers is to cheer up."

A. S. Semmes, of Detroit, said:

"I guess I wouldn't be buying $50,000 worth of clothing, mostly expensive, too, if we were running bread lines in Detroit. The outlook in our section is very bright, and I am sure it is going to be a good business year."

Similar statements were made by business men from Chicago, St. Louis, Louisville, and other cities.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, I ask that there be read in my time, or rather I will read an extract, showing the similarity between conditions existing in countries where the Dingley bill is in existence and where it is not in existence. I read the following:

LONDON WORKHOUSES FULL—MANY INFIRM PAUPERS BOARDING AT SANITARIUMS AT THE SEASIDE.

LONDON, January 29, 1908.

Inquiries throughout Great Britain show that lack of employment is responsible for acute distress in many towns, the trades most affected being building, engineering, and shipbuilding.

Owing apparently to the slackness of trade, the forty workhouses of Greater London are filled to overflowing. The latest returns show that in these workhouses there are 80,183 boarders, and that 45,821 people are receiving outdoor relief. This gives a ratio of 26.5 paupers to the thousand of the population.

It is impossible to grant all the applications for admittance to these institutions.

When we recall the fact that the London workhouse and the American poorhouse are practically the same, it is evident that the adversity that exists is world-wide and not local; that it covers territory and people beyond all possible reach of the Dingley law or its operation. Whatever temporary hard times exist in Pittsburg to-day, they do not begin to compare in seriousness with those that existed under the Cleveland Administration; but whatever they are, the people of Pittsburg will overcome them, as they have always done in every industrial crisis.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], a member of the committee.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I speak to-day of the Army of the United States. I have not prepared a speech, because it is a large subject and I have found by experience that I can be briefer when I speak eye to eye and face to face. In this bill the committee ask you to appropriate for the Army over $85,000,000. We ask you also to increase the pay of the enlisted men, which will increase the pay appropriated by that bill by some $4,000,000. This increase of pay is less than one-twentieth of the total expense of the Army, and the total pay given to our patriotic officers and men is less than $20,000,000. We can rightly appropriate what we give them. They are not a highly paid body of men. The Army is not a place for men who do nothing. The Army is the strong arm of Government. It was fathered by Washington. It was recommended to the attention of Congress in each and every one of his messages. It stands in this country ready to be the first line of defense in time of war; and I wish to say to this House that it now deserves the help of this House as much and more than any army that has ever existed in the United States before.

TRANSPORTATION AND TRANSPORTS.

We learn a good deal from the items of an appropriation bill as to the changes that have taken place in the Army. We find in that bill an appropriation for transportation of nearly $4,000,000, and for ships $5,000,000. That Army is serving the world over. It has to be taken to and from the insular or semi-insular possessions—Hawaii, the Philippines, and Alaska. The ordinary ship does not give to our soldiers bunked in its hold the accommodations that we desire to give to American men. We believe that the transport system that has been established is for the benefit of this country; that it furnishes auxiliaries to our Navy which are more than required, and we have no apologies to make for that system. We have nothing but praise for the wonderful work represented by these two appropriations, constituting together nearly one-tenth of the bill. They represent new conditions. They represent also self-sacrifice by the army of men who go into tropical climates for two or three years at a time, and sometimes, alas, in the past, with loss of health. Now, thank heaven, and thanks to the liberality of Congress and the wise provision of the War Department, we have barracks and quarters in the Philippine Islands, and we are to have and have now a camp upon the hills, in which men can recover their health, can stay for longer times, and can be taken care of as men of America should be taken care of.

BARRACKS AND QUARTERS.

Some appropriations for that purpose remain in this bill. It appropriates $2,000,000 for barracks and quarters in the Philippine Islands. The estimate was for $2,700,000. In these days we have had to cut down here and there as it seemed possible, but we are going to see that the Army of the United States shall live in health and in reasonable comfort, and these appropriations we believe to be almost the last of those that will be required for that purpose.

We have an Army of 67,500 men, if full. Before the great civil war it was but 10,000 men. Afterwards, up to the time of the Spanish war, it was 25,000. An increase from 25,000 to 67,000 means necessary buildings in which to house men and camps in which to keep them. What is more, it means a certain amount of concentration. In the old times our Army was distributed about Indian posts guarding the frontiers. Now the drill that is needed for an army in these days, when it must be trained for warfare with the best-trained armies of the world, at least as the first line, requires there should be larger posts—for at least a regiment, sometimes a brigade. I am free to say I do not altogether agree with the Department as to the system of brigade posts. I believe that a regimental command may be enough for each separate post and that the gatherings of the men for drill in larger bodies may better be in summer camps, under tents, and in communication with the militia and the National Guard, upon whom we must finally rely.

But regimental posts, at least, are required. We are providing them for our increased Army, or, rather, we are just finishing this work.

While the estimate for barracks and quarters is over $4,600,000, we were forced to cut down the appropriation to $3,000,000. The whole amount of the estimate would, perhaps, about complete the system of barracks and quarters in the United States. That completion has been postponed for another year. The appropriation still is large, but like other items is not to be charged to current expenses of the Army, but to the preparation that is necessary for the future in permanent buildings for their use.

MILITIA ENCAMPMENTS.

Now, I deeply regret that the committee found it necessary to strike off a million dollars estimated for this year's encampments with the militia. We must stand by the committee for this year. Any million dollars that can be postponed from this particular time until next year must be postponed. And yet there is no item in which we have higher confidence than in these camp expenses, which are not really chargeable to the standing Army, but chargeable to the great Volunteer Army of the United States, which we expect to call out in time of war.

We spend this money to bring the officers and men of the Regular Army in close touch with the officers and men of the National Guard, and give both of them that instruction which comes from sight of each other, from engaging in the same work, from going over the same problems day after day, from attending the same officers' school at night, from the learning and the experience that come from practice in scout and sentry duty, and above all, from the tactics of those camps, where they march from 20 to 30 miles a day in their various maneuvers. The duty of soldiers is perhaps threefold. First, organization and obedience to officers; secondly, how to shoot straight; thirdly, being able to march and to "get there." These lessons in time of peace had been forgotten in the old days by our militia, and they are being learned now by our National Guard. It is with pride we point to the appropriation for target practice of $1,300,000. It is with like pride that we point to the appropriations in recent bills, and which will be in future bills, for these encampments with the militia, in which they are taught, not thoroughly, but to a certain extent, the work of camping, marching, and the actual service required in war.

ALASKA TELEGRAPH AND ROADS.

We find in this bill items which would have struck men with astonishment in ancient days—several hundred thousand dollars for signal-service expenses and for telegraphs in Alaska and $250,000 for roads in Alaska. These are not merely Army expenses, but for the opening of new territory to civilization and to commerce. They relieve by telegraphic and road communications the thousands who are spread over that great territory, once thought to be merely arctic and incapable of human habitation. This relief given in the Army bill will be repaid to this country in after years a hundredfold.

RESERVE OF RIFLES.

There are other like items, and of one I am personally proud. There is an appropriation in the bill of $1,700,000 for the manufacture of arms, which provides for a hundred thousand rifles every year. Some years ago it was discovered, in the Spanish-American war, that we had few modern rifles, and that we must depend for fighting upon 300,000 to 400,000 old Springfield rifles, without magazines, with a very heavy kick, heavy weight, heavy bullet, and small range, and that we were manufacturing only about 25,000 rifles a year.

I am proud of the fact that the Committee on Military Affairs recommended that the estimates should be largely increased. We are now making 100,000 rifles every year, not for the Army, but for the manhood of the United States in case of war. We have, I believe, six or seven hundred thousand already on hand, but we should not be satisfied until we have the 2,000,000 that are needed fully to arm the people of the United States and the men behind the guns.

RESERVE OF CLOTHING AND EQUIPMENT, ARTILLERY AND AMMUNITION.

Another appropriation which has been very greatly increased this year, and upon the same principle—the committee recommend an appropriation of $7,000,000 for clothing. The Department estimated $8,335,000. We could wish to have given them every dollar, for that clothing is not intended for present use of the Army, but is intended to be stored in the Government warehouses, to a large amount, as a reserve, so that if we call out volunteers in time of war we will not have to wait five or six months for uniforms, as we did in the Spanish war, but will be able to arm and equip our men as they come.

Mr. Chairman, I point out these large items in this bill lest anyone say, "Why, you have only 67,000 men, and only about 50,000 in the ranks at the present time, and you are asking $85,000,000 for their support." It is not so. We are asking this $85,000,000 in large part for the greater army that is to be called out in case of necessity. We appropriate simply in obedience to the old motto, "In peace prepare for war." One gun, costing $17, is worth nearly as much as the man that you keep in the ranks at an expense, perhaps, all together, of a thousand dollars a year, because in case of necessity you can put another man into the ranks to use that extra gun. Clothing ready for use means an organized army at the start, instead of a disorganized mob without uniforms. Equipment in the Ordnance Department and in the Quartermaster's Department and a reserve of artillery mean the same.

THE GENERAL STAFF.

I congratulate this committee and this House that we now have a General Staff, which puts Army men at the head of the Department instead of civilians. That is the great legacy that we have from that greatest of Secretaries of War—perhaps not even excepting Stanton—Elihu Root. By this new system, which puts men at the head of the War Department who know the needs of fighting, we are really making provision from year to year for the national defense.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps I need say no more with reference to questions of money and appropriation. As we read the bill the various items will be explained or will explain themselves. We need now only indicate the wise changes adopted by our Government in the mode of administering military affairs, by which we recognize the necessity of a reserve of raw material, not merely for the Army that we have now, but for the Army that shall be, and by which we recognize that unless that reserve is provided the best little Army in the world would find itself lost at the beginning of a war.

This is not an appropriation for this year; it is an appropriation for the future. It is not spent, but it is saved in our arsenals. It goes into all branches of the military service; not as far as we would like to go, but to a certain extent into arms, quarters, reserve artillery, reserve ammunition, reserve of materials for ammunition, and reserve of clothing. In all those directions the wisdom of the present puts to shame the unpreparedness of the past.

THE STAFF DETAIL SYSTEM.

I can not help saying a word about the system of detail. This question is not in this bill. It has been touched upon by our chairman, with whom I very seldom have any disagreement. I believe in the system of details to the staff as now established, from top to bottom. I believe in it because permanent officials in a staff corps always become independent of the rest of the Army, no matter how you may say they are dependent. They hold their seats in their own offices, and by their permanent red tape they rule even a commanding general. I believe that the staff corps are proper divisions of an army, but that they should be subject to it. I believe in it because it is an odd fact that a man permanently sitting at a desk and receiving requisitions always seems to love to refer to a book to determine whether they shall be filled or not. Meantime the man in the field may have to have what he wants. Detail his brother officer to the staff, and if there be any fault in the requisition his brother officer will say, "Why, he needs that, and he has got to have it. Let us correct the requisition afterwards."

Details put men in the Departments who know the needs of active service and are likely to reform anything that does not work toward the needs of active service. We have seen practical reforms in every bureau of the War Department since the Spanish war and since I have been in Congress by reason of the detail system. That system gives an education of four years to the men who are detailed to the various Departments by which, when they go back to the line, they are ready to take hold of any problem in a future war, whether of transportation, of supplies, of ordnance, or what not. I believe that a soldier ought to be educated as much as may be in all branches of his profession. We attempt that education at West Point; and it is because infantry, artillery, cavalry, and engineers are educated together and in the same branches that we surpass the world in our education at West Point. But I believe that education must continue in the Army itself, and the system that sends men from the line to the various Departments and back into the line is the best and the only way to educate an all-round soldier.

I believe in it also for the reason given by our great Secretary—I will give the substance of his words—who said:

I come to you as an attorney for the Army. They are my clients. I have noticed that when men have a fixed position here in Washington, that year after year in the statutes, by a line here and a line there, the men who stay here receive the favors and promotions, while those upon the frontier fight the battles and are forgotten. I want to give them all an equal share of the acquaintance, the influence, the chance for promotion, which comes from being sent from time to time from the frontier to the central city and from the central city back again.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Would it interrupt the gentleman to ask him a question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. How much of that evil has been corrected during the seven years that we have had the detailed staff?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I think it has been very largely corrected. I think you will find that the particular acts to which I am referring, because I do not wish to be personal, that have been passed since that time for the benefit of various officers have been mostly for permanent officers.

But all these considerations work together. Even if special legislation be not prevented, the benefit of the education of the whole line in all branches of military service, and of the instruction of the staff that they must look out for the needs of the military service, and not for the red tape in their own offices, outweighs all defects of the detail system.

Mr. Chairman, there are other items in this bill that tell their own story.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. If it will not interrupt the gentleman at this point, I would like to ask whether the committee took up the question or whether the Department made any recommendation upon the question of the present number of our officers—as to whether we have sufficient number of officers.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The Department thinks we have not enough; I will come to that later. They have thought we have not enough, considering the immense number of details that are made.

THE PERSONNEL.

Of course the important part of an army, the most important part, is not the way they are armed or organized, although that is important, but the kind of men in that army and what they know and what they know how to do. The United States has adopted various ways of getting good officers and good men. Just after the Revolution there seems to have been the same contempt for any school, except that of war, that prevailed after the civil war. We are free to admit that the man who is educated in war knows very much more than one who has been educated in time of peace. We can only try to give the officer in time of peace some of the knowledge needed in war.

Nevertheless it was a pity. It was a great pity that the war of 1812 found our officers so ill educated and our Army so small that the battle of Bladensburg was a cowardly retreat of Americans before Englishmen, not at all superior in number, and that this Capitol was burned. It was a pity that from one end of the country to the other we suffered defeat after defeat until that magnificent natural soldier, Andrew Jackson, ranged his riflemen behind the breastworks at New Orleans, and gained his magnificent victory. When that war was over Congress enlarged the little school at West Point so as to provide that while we had an Army of only 5,000 men we should have 250 boys educated at that school. Two hundred and fifty was much more than sufficient to supply the officers of the Army.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman alluded to the battle of New Orleans and the magnificent fight of the Jackson troops there. About that time, the gentleman will remember that because we had raw troops in and about Washington, the Capitol was defenseless, and was burned and otherwise destroyed.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I so said a moment ago.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And because our troops were not well drilled and did not have the splendid leaders we would have if the policy was followed out, which, I take it, the gentleman is now arguing for.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not think I disagree with the gentleman at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. On the contrary, I was agreeing with the gentleman, I think.

WEST POINT.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I so understood. At that time we instituted the policy of educating twice as many men as were needed in the Army; at least half, and, I think, sometimes two-thirds, of the classes at West Point went into civil life. Who that remembers the magnificent work done in the war with Mexico does not recognize also that it was those educated men from West Point that had gone into civil life who did most of the best fighting in that war? Educated officers living in the different communities were some of the great men of the great civil war. Jackson was one upon the Confederate side. McClellan and Grant were others upon our side.

Mr. KEIFER. And Rosecrans.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Go through the list and it could almost be said that the men who had gone out from West Point with a military education and then had received the broadening influences of managing great affairs in different communities had at least as good a preparation as the men who went from West Point to some little western fort with a hundred men. The education told. At the present time, when we have 67,000 men in the Army, we have not increased West Point in the same proportion. We have thirteen times as many men in the Army as we had then, and we have not double as many men in West Point, so that we are supplying a very large proportion—I think, over half—of our Army officers by promotion from the ranks instead of from the educated graduates of West Point. Far be it from me to say that I do not believe in promotion from the ranks. I do; but I would like to have ten West Pointers instead of one.

ARMY SCHOOLS.

Why should not the young men who go into the ranks and show themselves fit be sent to get a training at the West Point school or at some other great military school where they may learn all branches of their profession? We lack room there for educating officers, but this bill tells you that the wise provision of this present Administration has done its best to fill the want. It has provided garrison schools for our posts. There are appropriations also for officers' schools in the various departments—cavalry, infantry, artillery, and engineers—and by the most severe competition men who have labored twelve to sixteen hours a day, who have distinguished themselves and passed through the officers' school at Leavenworth, are promoted to the Staff College and then the best men of the Staff College come to the War College here in Washington. They are mostly young men. Our Army has the advantage at present of having mostly young officers.

YOUNG OFFICERS.

It is a curious fact, and one that is in some respects a very great difficulty in the Army, that it is almost impossible to keep the average age about the same. During the long time of peace, almost an unbroken term up to the time of the civil war, officers kept their place for life without any retired list. When the war broke out men of, I think, nearly 80, like General Wool and others who were among the best of our old officers, had to be got rid of by the establishment of a retired list to move them off and fill up their places by younger men. Those younger men were perhaps in many cases unprepared by education to go there, but we had to fill up the list quickly. After the war the young veterans—we talk of old veterans, but men who came out of the civil war averaged under 25 years, an age at which when boys now graduate from college—the young veterans of the civil war filled the officers' list of the Army with that material, the best in the world.

Sometimes generals became lieutenants, and those young men were waiting, waiting, waiting, with no promotion except by the death of their seniors. In 1895 all the generals, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors had been in the civil war, and half the captains. During those thirty years they had been waiting vainly for promotion, some being even first lieutenants in the artillery. During the last twelve years we have seen a change. These heroes are mostly gone. Since 1895, except in the highest grades, the Army has been almost reofficered. Young officers fill it, and it is a good thing for the Army that it is so. Let us congratulate ourselves that the best blood of the American people of the very best age are doing their very best in the line and in service and staff schools, artillery schools, and cavalry schools to improve the Army of the United States. It was earnestly stated before us by the Chief of Staff that we have now, in his opinion, the very best officered Army that there is in the world, and that its service at Peking, as to which an extract was read in the speech of the chairman, proved that as to supply, as to management, as to foresight, our little army in China was superior to any there.

ARMY PAY OFFICERS.

I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, I am taking too much time. The topics are many and important. There is one subject to which I wish now to recur. The committee ask this House for its unanimous consent to an increase in the pay of the enlisted man and a reapportionment of the amounts paid to privates and petty officers. I wish that we could have dared to ask the consent of the House to an increase in the pay of the lower officers—not the higher ones, but the lower officers. The scale of pay for the officers was raised a little in the year 1870, I am not sure but some small modifications were made in 1876. A lieutenant gets $1,400 a year; if mounted, $100 more for the keeping and maintenance of his horse and the employment of some men to take care of it. A captain gets $1,800 a year. As I have pointed out, when the Army remains the same and there is no great increase in number to make promotions by filling new branches of the service, then if it be filled with young men from top to bottom, promotion may be very slow, and a man may be thirty years in the service before he gets beyond the rank of a captain.

In this country, under present conditions, a man of the first rank in education and ability is commanded to live with his equals in the community on equal terms—he and his family—and what would you say to the provision that may leave that man, after thirty years in the service, with only $1,800, plus, I believe, 40 per cent for longevity pay, which makes about $2,520 at the end of that time. A change is urgently demanded, and at the same time the conditions in various parts of this country differ so much that it is very difficult to get any unanimous opinion from any House on any question of salary. Just to give an example, when the question of judicial salaries came up the judges in New York said, and said truly, that $6,000 a year would not pay their house rent, while Representatives from the Southwest said that the judges of their highest State courts received only $3,000 or $3,500, and that $6,000 was exorbitant. The same is true in the Post-Office Department. The payment to a rural carrier in our part of the country of $600 will hardly keep him out of the poorhouse, while in the Southwest, where every man owns a horse, and that horse does not have to be shod, and the roads are sandy and the food is mostly corn, and oats are not, as they are with us, 70 cents a bushel, that man is very glad to get the opportunity to serve for $600 a year.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, rural carriers get $900.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Nine hundred dollars? It has been raised, then?

Mr. GRIGGS. Certainly; over a year ago.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Very well. I have not kept up with it. I will say, then, as to $900, that that is almost a fortune in some regions, while it is almost poor pay when you get near a city delivery in the Eastern States.

Mr. GRIGGS. What does the gentleman mean by the Southwest? To what section does the gentleman refer?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. As to the judges, I refer to the State of Arkansas.

Mr. GRIGGS. If it is Arkansas, it is all right. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. But I am wasting time in comparisons. All I mean to say is that when we get into the question of officers' salaries in a House where some of the Members come from a region where money is worth more than in others, we dare not ask unanimous consent, and may have to leave that for a separate bill. I am sorry. I believe that we must make some provision. I believe it necessary both in the Army and Navy—less perhaps in the Navy.

I will not repeat the figures which I gave in a speech made on February 12 last, with reference to pay, promotion, retirement, and command; but the odd fact is that though the pay of the officer of equal rank is the same in the Army and Navy, the proportions of those holding those various ranks differ so that in the Army only 15 per cent of the total number hold a rank and get pay above that of captain, whereas in the Navy over 40 per cent at that time held that superior rank, and the chances of promotion and to get higher rank were then, and I believe still are, greater than they are in the Army. In every employment the question is not how much is paid to a man in a certain rank, but what chance has he to go to a higher rank—that is, what proportion hold that higher rank and give him that chance. I have gone over this carefully. I regret that both in the Army and in the Navy, with the social and other requirements thrown upon officers, that we can not do something to avoid what is certainly coming in a few years, and that is the crowding of the Army with officers of the lower ranks who have no chance of promotion. I regret it the more because we want to see success reward the earnest efforts of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CAPRON], who brought in a bill to this House to increase the pay of captains and lieutenants by some small percentage, and then to secure to the enlisted men increase of their pay, somewhat such as we try to give by this bill, by leaving the question of pay to the President of the United States, as it is left to him in the naval bill. The committee saw no hope of carrying through this House the particular form of remedy proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island, but by his earnest endeavors and by the fact that he called the attention of the country to the way we are treating the privates and enlisted men throughout we are going to get through some such increase as is given by this bill. That increase is due to him.

PAY OF ENLISTED MEN.—OUR RECRUITS.

I should have been glad if that gentleman had explained the exact changes we have made rather than myself, but I shall try now to give them to the House.

The pay of the private soldier in an army has always been a difficult thing to adjust. In time of war the ranks are filled with the pick of the land. It would neither be possible to pay these millions high pay, nor would it be advantageous. In our Volunteer Army in time of war we want the man who does not reckon the question of pay. In time of peace, our Army is filled with several different classes. We do not get the merely stupid, as a rule, as they do in foreign armies. Our requirements are severe. Our Army does not take fools. We require education, and turn down such a large proportion of the men who apply because of defects, mental or physical, that the figures are astounding. Sometimes over half are turned away that want to enlist. We do get a certain proportion of clever fellows who have made a failure in some other way. Sometimes, alas, it is the man who is turned out of work in bad times. Army recruiting has increased very largely lately. Sometimes it is the man who is down on his luck, whether it be by family or business misfortunes, and some of our best soldiers come from men who at the time they went in said: "I do not know what to do for myself; why not enlist?"

Sometimes, and in a larger class of cases, it is the youngster that thinks he would like to get into the Army as a profession and be a soldier—the same is true in the Navy—and he gets it into his head that he will get a promotion. He is educated and has a chance to take an examination for commissioned officer and take his place in the ranks of the best people of the land. It is something brave to look on the troops at Fort Myer or the engineers at the barracks, and to see the large proportion of fine-faced young men who are in the ranks.

Now, we want those men in the Army. We want to make it possible to have them. I am sorry to say that there have been some measures of discipline taken that I think sometimes drive them out. I think that we ought not to have said to them—I have had that out before and will not argue it now—that they should not drink a glass of beer in their soldiers' clubs—in their post exchange—but must be forced to have it on the outside. I do not think that is the way to treat free-born American citizens. [Applause.] The post is their only home, their only family. If they can take refreshment there, they take it under the restraint of the family, and it can be so arranged by military discipline that nobody gets too much. I have argued that out before and will not argue it now. It is not in the bill.

PRESENT PAY OF NONCOMMISSIONED OFFICERS.—CHANCE FOR PROMOTION.

We have done a great deal for their food. We have made large appropriations likewise for the post exchange, for newspapers, and gymnastics, and all that is there; but the really important thing is to let the man understand that he has a chance for promotion and a rise. Now, I am not going through the details of this matter; that I gave at the last session. The facts are astounding. A private in the Army starts at $13 a month. The man in the Navy starts at $16 a month. The man in the Army, if he becomes, after great difficulty, a first sergeant, gets $24 a month. The pay in the Navy runs up not only through a whole grade of gunners and master gunners and all that sort of thing to $60 and $70 a month, but they have selected from the best of them a set of "warrant officers," so called, who hold for life, like any other officers, and have $1,200 and $1,500 a year of actual pay. These figures are not exactly fair in only one respect. I believe the sailor in the Navy, after the first suit of clothes, furnishes his own uniform. The man in the Army does not. That would only amount to $4 or $5 a month, while the whole difference between the first sergeant in the Army, receiving $24 a month, and the warrant officer in the Navy, receiving $1,500 a year, is so great that it can hardly be understood.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Has not the gentleman placed the pay of some of the warrant officers in the Navy too low? Some of them get more than that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The gentleman is quite right. I have the list here. The warrant officers of the Navy include chief boatswains who are ensigns after twenty years, at $1,960 a year; three chief boatswains, at $1,820 a year; twenty chief boatswains, at $1,680; two chief boatswains, at $1,748; thirty-seven, at $1,540; fifty-nine, at $1,300; forty-six, at $1,200; five chief gunners, at $1,960. The gentleman is entirely right. These warrant officers run up into large figures, while the chief petty officers receive $50 to $85 a month; thirty-eight officers of the first class, $36 to $70; of the second class, $35 to $45; third class, $30 to $35. These large provisions for pay have been added in the Navy because probably it is more specialized than the Army. The boatswain has special work to do. The gunner has his particular gun to take care of. The ship is thoroughly organized, with men above and men below; but by means of the right to fix pay given to the President of the United States the result has been that, in round figures, the average pay of the Army last year was $212.50, including all the noncommissioned officers and privates, and the average pay for the Navy was $378.58 a year.

That is, by the estimates of last year the average pay of the Navy was 80 per cent more than the average pay of the Army. We have, by special statute, put in some electricians at $75 a month. There are one or two other signal officers, and some men who do very careful duty with telegraphy who receive good pay; but, on the whole, the enlisted man of the Army is pitifully paid. A private gets $13 a month, with a very small increase for reenlistment. He got $12 a month over fifty years ago by the act of 1854. He got $13 a month by the act of 1861. It is an increase from 1802, when he was paid but $5 a month. But that is not the point. When we wish to recruit an army which is able to do work in the field, we must fill it up with men of ambition, and in order to get men of ambition we have got to pay them fairly. Under the wise advice of the Chief of Staff and Secretary of War the committee has not suggested a large increase for the enlisted men. They believe that the increase should come in the pay of the petty officers, so that the man who is ambitious and fit to be promoted to corporal, sergeant, or first sergeant, or sergeant-major will remain in the Army, while the poorer ones will go out.

And I would not say that only the poorer ones should go out. There is not an army on the continent of Europe that does not train its men for three or four years (in Germany only two years), and there ends their enlistment as far as serving with the colors is concerned (except for a few months in the year for some years and a few weeks afterwards), for the sake of training the whole community as soldiers.

And there is a great deal to be said in favor of a system which will take in a man for a few years, and if he is not good enough to become an officer and does not wish to become an officer, let him go back to the community again, so as to have the whole community filled with men who know the duty of a soldier. European countries provide that they shall remain on the rolls, and shall belong to a reserve, and shall report every year. America might possibly institute such a system, but thus far there is no one who believes it is necessary, because in case of a war there is not one of those young men out of a hundred who have been in the Army and have had their training and gone into civil life that will not come back into the Army of their country for the war. Do not let us fear about that, and do not let us fear if we do not get reenlistments. We encourage reenlistments. We provide by this bill one thing that will help that. Often a man at the end of his enlistment thinks that he is a little tired of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Five minutes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Very often a man feels pretty tired at the end of his enlistment, and goes back home. After he has been there a little while he finds himself tired of home, and reenlists. Now, we want to get those men back more often.

THREE MONTHS' PAY ON ENLISTMENT.

They are some of the best men in the Army, and we therefore provide with all grades that three months' extra pay by way of bounty shall be paid to any man who enlists within three months. If he stays with his regiment, he gets three months' extra pay; if he goes home and stays any time less than three months, he gets pay for any time after he gets back besides those three months. We believe that that will work well.

PROPOSED PAY OF NONCOMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

But the real change made by the bill is in the ranks of the higher noncommissioned officers. Instead of paying a corporal $20, we expect to pay him $24. Instead of paying a quartermaster-sergeant $18, we pay him $30. The drum major, from $25, we raise to $35. The quartermaster-sergeants, engineers, are raised from $34 to $35. We expect to raise the sergeant-majors from $25 to $40. We expect to raise the first sergeant from $25 to $45. The first sergeant of a company is the man who, under the captain, has charge of all the discipline of the company. Can it be believed that up to this time we paid him less than a dollar a day for taking care of 100 men? He keeps the records; he runs the company. He is the head of the men and represents them with the captain. We have made all too little an increase in all of these grades. The highest that we have upon this list remains the same—the master electrician, $75. Compare that, however, with the $1,960 paid in the Navy. We recognize, Mr. Chairman, that in this matter this House at this time would prefer to go slowly. The bill gives all grades an addition of $3 on the second and third enlistments and $1 for the others up to the seventh.

We hope with this to be able to keep our best noncommissioned officers; we hope to be able to keep men that will drill our men.

You can not have good drill unless you can keep your noncommissioned officers, and we ask of this House now, as only a partial measure, but as one that is absolutely due, that we help the organization of our Army by doing something now, by unanimous consent, for the enlisted men. I wish that every Member of this House were here to hear that request and to know the facts with reference to the way we have treated the enlisted man before he says "no." [Applause.]

APPENDIX A.

NOTE ON NONCOMMISSIONED OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN.

The conditions of the service of enlisted men and warrant and petty officers are very different in the Army and Navy. The number of such in the Army are as follows:

Noncommissioned officers and men.	Number.	Pay.
Line	52,578	$10,624,442.25
Engineers	1,232	302,604.00
Ordnance Department	700	229,372.00
Quartermaster's and Subsistence Department	400	96,600.00
Electricians, Artillery Corps	125	69,300.00
Signal Corps	1,212	372,448.00
Hospital Corps	3,155	870,350.00
Total	59,452	12,556,126.25

This is an average pay for each enlisted man of $212.83.

The warrant officers of the Navy (see pp. 614–615) are as follows: 4 chief boatswains (ensigns after twenty years), at $1,960; 3 chief boatswains (fourth five years), at $1,820; 20 chief boatswains (third five years), at $1,680; 2 chief boatswains (third five years) (beyond seas), at $1,748; 37 chief boatswains (second five years), at $1,540; 2 chief boatswains (second five years) (beyond seas), at $1,694; 59 boatswains (second three years), at $1,300; 46 boatswains (first three years), at $1,200; 5 chief gunners (ensigns after twenty years), at $1,960; 6 chief gunners (fourth five years), at $1,820; 17 chief gunners (third five years), at $1,680; 48 chief gunners (second five years), $1,540; 1 chief gunner (second five years) (beyond seas), $1,694; 35 gunners (second three years), at $1,300; 56 gunners (first three years), at $1,200; 10 chief carpenters (ensigns after twenty years), at $1,960; 2 chief carpenters (fourth five years), at $1,820; 21 chief carpenters (third five years), at $1,680; 28 chief carpenters (second five years), at $1,540; 1 chief carpenter (second five years) (beyond seas) $1,694; 39 carpenters (second three years), at $1,300; 30 carpenters (first three years), at $1,200; 6 chief sailmakers (ensigns after twenty years), at $1,960; 116 warrant machinists (third three years), at $1,400; 52 warrant machinists (second three years), at $1,300; 82 warrant machinists (first three years), at $1,200; 17 pharmacists (fourth three years), at $1,600; 4 pharmacists (third three years), at $1,400; 4 pharmacists (second three years), at $1,300, and 66 mates (appointed since August 1, 1894), at $900.

Chief petty officers, $50 to $85.

Petty officers, first class, $36 to $70; second class, $35 to $45; third class, $30 to $35.

Seamen, first class, $24 to $28; second class, $19 to $33; third class, $16 to $24

Commissary branch, $16 to $80; mess-men branch, $16 to $65; enlisted men of the Marine Corps, $13 to $44.

The above rates of pay are affected by the following provisions:

Allowance of 75 cents per month for each good-conduct medal, pin, or bar; allowance of $5 per month for duty on submarine vessels of the Navy; allowance of $5 per month for crew mess men; allowance of 33 cents per day for seamen and ordinary seamen doing duty as firemen or coal passers; allowance of from $1 to $3 per month for men doing duty as signalmen; allowance of from $2 to $10 per month for men doing duty as gun pointers.

The above are the most important variations of pay allowed by law. A few are not given, because of the small number of men affected.

By a more recent Executive order the pay of each rating is increased $5 a month during the second period of service, and $3 per month during every subsequent period of service. The pay of noncommissioned officers of the Army is shown on pages 169, etc., of the estimates. Sergeant-majors get $408; first sergeants, $300; farriers, corporals, and sutlers, $180; wagoners, $168; musicians, trumpeters, and privates, $156. Some of the chief musicians get up as high as $720; first sergeants in the Signal Corps, $540; master electricians (end of page 170) get $900.

It is interesting to compare the first-class sergeants in the Hospital Corps, $540 a year, besides longevity pay, amounting in all to nearly $60 a month, or $720 a year, while a first-class pharmacist in the Navy, which is the same position, gets $1,600 a year.

Altogether in the Navy the appropriation for warrant officers, petty officers, and men, 38,319 in number, was estimated at $14,500,000, or an average pay of $378.58, which is 80 per cent more than the average pay of the enlisted force of the Army.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, we have been told recently that the members of the minority in this Chamber perform a very good service to the country in criticising the actions of the majority. One gentleman actually complimented the minority, in very stinted terms, however, upon its performance of this duty. I rise this afternoon to call the attention of the country to certain legislation now pending before the committees of this House and which ought to engage the attention of the majority in this Chamber whether it does or not. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I say that it will be nothing less than criminal if this Congress shall adjourn without passing some financial legislation to make impossible, if it can be done, a recurrence of another panic. I of course do not know what bill the majority intends to pass, but hardly a day passes that some of us do not receive letters from bankers or business men expressing a most anxious solicitude with respect to this legislation. This is not a party question, and every man in this Chamber should be actuated by the most patriotic motives in endeavoring to write upon our statute books the very best legislation the intelligence of this Chamber can devise to relieve the present anxiety of the business men of this country.

For one I would scorn to make capital for my party, even if I had it in my power to do so, out of a situation like the present. Bankers and business men of my district tell me that it is by no means certain that the panic is over. They have a right to expect Congress to act. The President has urged speedy action, and we shall bring upon ourselves a condemnation which will be deserved if we allow differences of opinion to prevent the enactment of some legislation to restore the confidence of the people. The effects of the recent panic have been felt by all classes, not only by the banker, the merchant, and the manufacturer, but by the farmer as well. Almost all legislation is a compromise. While I stand here this afternoon many of our business enterprises are imperiled, not because they are not solvent, not because they are not honestly conducted, but solely because there seems to be lack of confidence everywhere. You of the majority are fond of boasting of your boldness and your ability to solve great questions. The responsibility is upon you. We of the minority have no disposition to obstruct the legislative pathway of any just and proper measure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Whatever bill you agree upon should be framed to bring relief to all classes as far as possible, not only to the banker of Wall street, but to business men, farmers—all classes. Your legislation will be a failure if it only helps the rich and powerful.

I have myself introduced a bill intended as an emergency measure. If there is any reason why the Aldrich bill should become a law, the same reason applies, I submit, with greater force to the bill I have introduced. It can not be denied that the Aldrich bill will make money easier in time of panic, but it will at the same time strengthen the value of railroad bonds and stocks as well. The bill I have introduced will likewise make money easier in time of panic, and it would also tend to strengthen the price of one of the great agricultural products of the country which millions of our people are engaged in producing. If a railroad bond is good security for emergency currency a bale of packed cotton is better security, for many millions of railroad bonds in the final analysis rest upon the bale of cotton and are dependent upon that great staple product for their own value and stability upon the market.

The bankers of New York tell us they need a large volume of currency to move the cotton crop of the South and the wheat crop of the West. If this Congress will write into law the plan for an emergency currency suggested by my bill, which provides that money may be issued against cotton-warehouse certificates, then the farmers of the South at least will not need the assistance of the bankers of New York City. More than this, Mr. Chairman, more than this, the plan suggested by my bill would in time of stress free the farmer from the domination of the money trust of Wall street. It would free the smaller banker in the interior from the domination of the same trust. I have not the time to-day to engage in a lengthy discussion of the plan suggested by the bill I have introduced. I will say that in my judgment it is a perfectly practicable measure, a just measure, and that the security for the circulating medium provided is a better security than that afforded by the Aldrich bill.

I am not one of the powers that be, and I do not therefore expect that my bill will receive the consideration to which I believe it is justly entitled. Even the Wall Street Journal in an editorial feels constrained to admit that the security afforded by my bill is equally as good as that provided by the measure which I am told you intend to pass. If the great army of voters engaged in agriculture are wise in their day and generation, they will give consideration to the idea suggested by this bill—an idea, however, by no means original.

Mr. Chairman, this Congress has now been in session nearly three months, and what has been done? Nothing, absolutely nothing. And yet at this very moment there are a dozen measures of vital importance to the people of this nation which could be passed by this House in less than a week's time. My purpose in addressing the House this afternoon is to call attention to some of these measures.

For hundreds of miles along the Atlantic seaboard our people are engaged in the business of raising truck for the market. Millions of dollars in recent years have been invested by our truck farmers in lands suitable for the raising of vegetables, melons, and berries, and in properly preparing these lands for early crops. Quick transportation means everything to the truck farmer. To some of his products a delay of twenty-four hours, I am told, means ruin. In my State hundreds of thousands of dollars have been invested in the cultivation of berries. The farmers of North Carolina raise the best strawberry in the world. They can not put their berries upon the market as soon as the Florida farmer, of course, but for beauty, for sweetness, and for flavor I challenge the world to produce a berry superior to that raised by the truckers of my own State. Last season the loss which these people sustained was enormous. Why? Not because the crop failed, not because of any fault of theirs, but solely because they could not procure refrigerator cars to move their crops, already raised, already picked and crated and placed on the platforms of our railroad depots ready to be shipped to the northern markets.

Thousands of crates of delicious berries were thus ruined. I will not undertake to say where the blame should rest. I do know it was not the fault of the truck farmer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to prevent a recurrence of this disaster several bills have been introduced and are now pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I have not the time now to discuss the merits of the bills to which I have referred. I shall do no more than call the attention of the majority in this Chamber to the necessity of legislation upon this subject, to remind you that the President in his recent message has recommended the enactment of some legislation to facilitate the transportation of perishable property, and to warn you that if this Congress shall adjourn without action upon this important subject the blame will rest upon the Republican majority of the Sixtieth Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, Mr. Chairman, I find in the message of the President of the United States language as follows:

> There is no moral difference between gambling at cards or in lotteries or on the race tracks or gambling in the stock market.

Pretty strong language, Mr. Chairman. The President of the United States, leader of the Republican party, declares in a special message to Congress that there is no moral difference between gambling at cards or in lotteries or on the race tracks and gambling in the stock market. I hold in my hand several bills introduced by your own people, making it unlawful to use the mails in gambling transactions. Will you pass them or not? Your President in his message is demanding the enactment of some one of these bills into law. It is now up to you, you have the authority to act, and the question is whether you will do with respect to these measures as you have done with so many others, and that is to leave them to die in the archives of your committee room. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am told there is a class of men whose domicile is principally in New York City who have no other business than that of betting upon the stock market or the cotton market or the grain market. No man ought to engage in any business unless that business adds something to the wealth of the world or conduces to the comfort or happiness of mankind. The man who makes his living by betting that the price of a certain stock or commodity will be above or below a certain price at a certain time, or who acts as the agent of others who wish to lay the same wager, performs the very poorest possible service to his fellowman. If he puts a dollar in the pocket of one man, that dollar is taken out of the pocket of another, while, in any event, both parties to the wager must contribute to pay the betting agent for his distinguished services. The fee that this agent gets is simply the rake off the keeper of a gambling house gets for providing accommodations for his patrons to play at cards or other gambling games.

There is a clear distinction, Mr. Chairman, between gambling pure and simple in the great staple products of the farm or in stocks and in legitimate purchases or sales for future delivery. I know very well that our manufacturers of cotton goods, for instance, in the course of business are often compelled to sell the output of their mills for months ahead; that in order to protect themselves against loss they must deal in cotton for future delivery. Transactions of this kind are of course legitimate and proper. If the farmer wishes to sell his crop at a certain price, to be delivered at a certain time, no man should desire to deprive him of the right to do as he pleases with what he produces. Indeed, he is well within his constitutional rights when he makes a sale of the products of his farm at such time, at such price, and upon such conditions as his judgment may dictate. I am not speaking of either the one or the other class of transactions. I am speaking of the speculator, pure and simple, who neither produces nor manufactures. There is a difference between the two classes of transactions easily distinguished—the transaction necessary in the legitimate course of business and the naked wager.

The President is urging you of the majority to act. I hold in my hand a number of bills, some of them introduced by Republicans, drawn to meet the recommendation in your own President's message. The question is, Will you pass any one of these bills introduced by your own people? Will you carry out the recommendation of your own President, or are you afraid of Wall street? Let there be no misunderstanding. President Roosevelt declares that the man who makes a business of gambling in stocks or in any commodity is no better than any other professional gambler. No moral difference, says the President. What will you do about it, you gentlemen on the other side of the center aisle? You have the power. This machine known as the American House of Representatives is in your hands, not ours. Will you dodge the issue or will you meet it as your President requests you to do? Many of you represent agricultural districts. The farmers of this country, almost to a man, are opposed to the professional gambler. They live in a different atmosphere. They strive and toil and are content to accept for the product of their toil the price fixed by God's law of supply and demand. You will in a few months face these constituents of yours again. What excuse will you render? Here are your bills, here is the recommendation of your President, here in this Chamber now is your working majority. What do you propose to do about it? Be assured that the people of this nation will be informed where the responsibility rests. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, there is still another matter to which I would call the attention of our Republican friends. Your President has repeatedly expressed his most strenuous disapproval of the great campaign contributions by which the American electorate has been corrupted time and again, by which in 1896 you prevented the election of a man to the Presidency of the United States who, but for the use of a huge corruption fund, would have received an overwhelming majority at the ballot box. I have charged on this floor before, and I charge now, that in 1896 you used enough money to throttle the will of the people and thereby prevent the election of William J. Bryan to the Presidency of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have been told that in one day's time half a million dollars were raised in the city of Boston in that campaign. For what? Let echo answer for what. I do not know, of course, whether this is true, but it was told to me by a man who ought to know what he was talking about.

Millions of dollars were accumulated in that campaign for the purpose of corrupting the American electorate.

Not a man of you will deny it, and some of you ought to know whether the charge is true or false. In the message of the President I notice that he mentions certain offenders by name, the Standard Oil Company, for instance. Let me read what he says about this corporation:

> The methods by which the Standard Oil people and those engaged in the other combinations of which I have spoken above have achieved great fortunes can only be justified by the advocacy of a system of morality which would also justify every form of criminality on the part of a labor union and every form of violence, corruption, and fraud from murder to bribery and ballot-box stuffing in politics.

This in effect charges the men who have built up the Standard Oil Company with every species of crime from murder to bribery and ballot-box stuffing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me indulge in a little plain talk also in my very humble way. A political party which, through its national chairman and committee, is willing to use funds contributed by such an organization as the President says the Standard Oil Company is for the purpose of buying votes, and thereby corrupting our elections, is not better than the Standard Oil Company itself.

God knows I am not here to defend this concern or any other monopoly. I have been fighting them all my life, but this is a most serious matter to which I would call the attention of this Chamber. I want to know if the national chairman of the Republican party accepted a contribution from the Standard Oil Company in the year 1900 or the year 1904? The man who receives stolen goods, knowing the same to have been stolen, is no better than the thief himself. According to the President, the Standard Oil Company has pursued a career of crime for years.

I want to know, and I believe the people of this country would like to know, whether the Republican party has been buying its way to power by the use of Standard Oil money. Here is a resolution I have introduced directing the Speaker to appoint a committee to make this inquiry. It would not be a very difficult investigation. All the committee would have to do would be to send for Mr. Cortelyou and subpœna him to bring along his books, showing who contributed. It would not be very expensive to bring the treasurer of the national committee from New York City and subpœna him to bring along his books, showing who contributed to the great corruption fund of 1896 and of 1900. It is easy to preach morality and righteousness, but no man can have that righteousness which exalteth a nation who is willing to accept or hold a great office to which he has been elevated by the corrupt use of money at the ballot box; money contributed by a monopoly which for years has been violating the law; money exacted from the people in violation of law and morals. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the President has brought the most serious charge one man can make against another against the people constituting the Standard Oil Company. If his party has a clean record, if his national chairman in the last two campaigns, when he has been a candidate, has not accepted money from these people, then his party should court the fullest investigation. Let the House pass my resolution and let the committee subpœna the national chairmen of both the great parties. Let us have a look at their books. If you will permit this, it will do more to purify elections in America than a whole volume of talk. Let me quote further from the President's message:

> Just as the blackmailer and bribe-giver stand on the same evil eminence of infamy, so the man who makes an enormous fortune by corrupting legislatures and municipalities and fleecing his stockholders and the public stands on the same moral level with the creature who fattens on the blood money of the gambling house and the saloon.

Of course, every good man says amen to this, but is the man who uses money in the purchase of votes any better? Is not the man who corrupts the voter just as bad as the man who corrupts the member of a legislature? We, at least, know that the Republican party accepted more than a hundred thousand dollars of money from certain insurance companies of New York City. We, at least, know that this money was practically stolen from the policy holders in those companies. I know a widow lady who was a policy holder in one of these companies. In 1892 she took out a policy upon which she was to pay a premium of $450 per annum for fifteen years.

They filed with her policy an "illustration," as they called it, in which they said that according to the past experience of the company they would pay her in 1907, at the expiration of the fifteen-year period, the sum of $8,900. Now, bear in mind the lady paid out in premiums during those fifteen years $6,750. How much do you suppose they actually paid her last fall? I happen to know, for I made the settlement for her. The company wrote her that on account of the increase in expenses and the decrease in interest rates it could, or would, only pay her $7,240; that is to say, $1,660 less than they promised to pay. Part of that money went into the coffers of the Republican party, and was no doubt used to aid the election of the Republican ticket.

Mr. Chairman, I cheerfully accord to the President a sincere desire for pure methods in politics, but I submit he can well begin by demanding absolute purity and cleanliness in the methods of his own party. We are now upon the threshold of another great national contest. You Republicans are by no means as certain your candidate will be elected as some of you pretend you are. Here are half a dozen bills regulating campaign contributions. One of them is, I notice, drawn by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], one of the statesmen of this House. Will you consider these bills?

Will you not consider some one of them, when the necessity for action is plain, when your own President is urging you to act? If you do not write one of these bills in our statutes, what excuse can you offer to the people when you return to ask their suffrages? We of the minority are ready to help you. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us pass a bill which will forever prevent a recurrence of the insurance scandal. So long as you allow political parties to raise huge corruption funds to be used on election day, so long our elections will be a mere mockery and sham. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But I come now to a matter of supreme importance to every man, woman, and child in America. You Republicans are fond of boasting of what you have done to bring relief to the people from the domination and oppression of monopoly. Well, what have you done? I make this statement and challenge any one of you to rise now in my time and dispute it, if you can. There is not a human being in all this broad land who has been enabled to purchase any one of the necessaries of life any cheaper by reason of anything your party has done up to the present time. Let anyone stop and think. If you can recall any instance where any man, woman, or child in all this nation has been enabled to buy any necessary of living any cheaper by reason of anything you or your party has done, I will stop here and now and give you the chance to inform the country when and where the transaction took place. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Your Department of Justice has prosecuted perhaps a half dozen violators of the law. Your district attorney in Chicago convicted poor old Walsh for doing what hundreds of others have done, but who did not lose and hence were never prosecuted at all. Your district attorney down in Georgia convicted Captain Carter and Greene and Gaynor for conspiring to defraud the United States Government, and conspiracy to defraud has been an offense against the law for hundreds if not a thousand years. Much credit is claimed for these prosecutions and convictions in the President's message:

> The Federal Government does scourge sin—

He declares—

> it does bid sinners fear, for it has put behind the bars with impartial severity the powerful financier, the powerful politician, the rich land thief, the rich contractor—all, no matter how high, against whom criminal misdeeds can be proved.

But, Mr. Chairman, your 300 trusts are still doing business at the same old stand, violating the law three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, except one year in four, when they violate the law one day more. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Yes, indeed, the message of President Roosevelt is one of the most terrible arraignments which ever emanated from the White House. No less than a dozen times he feels impelled to denounce predatory wealth. He speaks of certain "wealthy men whose conduct should be abhorrent to every man of ordinarily decent conscience," of "corrupt men of vast wealth," of "wealthy malefactors," of "very wealthy criminals," of "certain wrongdoers who happen to be wealthy."

No man will deny, Mr. Chairman, that such persons and such corporations as the President describes do actually exist in this nation, but let me inquire who is responsible for their presence here in this boasted land of equality and of freedom? How is it that in this country of ours criminals have become so great and so powerful, so defiant, so utterly regardless of law, that the President of the United States in a message to the Congress must prefer an indictment against them, and in some instances even mention them by name?

Prior to 1870 such a thing as a trust was hardly known in the United States. We had few millionaires. The wealth of our people was far more evenly distributed than it is now. However honest the President may be in his purpose (and I for one certainly do not question his sincerity), the solemn truth is that the very party to which he belongs is itself responsible for the very conditions against which the President in his agony of spirit cries out to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] However patriotic the President may be, the very party to which he belongs and its policies are responsible for the presence among us of these "corporations desiring to rob the people," of "these wealthy and powerful wrongdoers," of these "law-breaking corporations," of "these wealthy malefactors," and of the modern American trust which, according to the President, has "succeeded in crushing out every competitor, in overawing our common carriers, and in establishing a monopoly which treats the public with contempt." The party to which the President belongs has made possible every one of the things against which he in his message so eloquently protests. Under equal laws impartially administered these conditions could never have existed. Under equal laws impartially administered it is almost impossible for the multimillionaire to exist.

The Republican party has surrounded the trusts and monopolies and wealthy malefactors with a wall which shuts out all competition and has delivered to them the American people as their legitimate prey, and because these trusts, monopolies, and wealthy malefactors have taken advantage of the opportunities offered by the Republican party the President now cries out in righteous indignation and sounds the alarm of great national peril. Read over the list of your American trusts, Mr. Chairman; read over the list of your American millionaires, and, with rare exceptions, you will find that they have built up their immense fortunes at the expense of the American consumer. Truly the President says:

> There are ample material rewards for those who serve with fidelity the mammon of unrighteousness.

Verily, Mr. Chairman, is this mammon of unrighteousness your Republican protective tariff. When you shut out competition from the whole world, do you expect that your American trusts will fail to take advantage of the monopoly thus created by law? The President very properly denounces monopoly. It is the curse of our modern civilization. No man will deny it. But the greatest of all monopolies, the most prolific parent of all your criminal trusts, is your present unjust, unrighteous protective tariff system. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] By your system of taxation you have strangled competition and have created yourselves the most stupendous monopoly the world has ever seen. And then your President rises up to denounce men for taking advantage of the very opportunities and temptations which you yourselves offer.

The President declares in his remarkable message that if it were true that to cut rottenness from the body politic meant a momentary check to an unhealthy, seeming prosperity, he would not for one moment hesitate to put the knife to the corruption. You can pass your antitrust laws as often as you please; you can make them as strong as legislative ingenuity will permit, but you are treating this condition of corruption merely upon the surface so long as you allow the cause of the corruption to remain. The very blood of our body politic has become infected by your unholy, unrighteous system of taxation. It is strange that this poison should manifest itself in so many places? The treatment you have heretofore administered, the treatment which even your own President, honest and patriotic though he may be, is attempting to administer, is but a weak palliative. This great nation will never become absolutely healthy until you remove the poison from its very lifeblood.

Sir John Culpeper, in a speech in the Long Parliament, in speaking of monopolies, declared that—

> They are a nest of wasps, a swarm of vermin which have overcrept the lands. Like the frogs of Egypt, they have gotten possession of our dwellings, and we have scarce a room for them. They sup in our cup. They dip in our dish. They sit by our fires. We find them in the dye vat, washbowl, and powdering tub. They share with the butler in his box. They will not bate us a pin. We may not buy our clothes without their brokerage. These are the leeches that have sucked the commonwealth so hard that it is almost heretical.

These, Mr. Chairman, were the words of a prophet. Surely he looked down the dim vista of time and saw the vision of this fair land of ours, blessed of God with all His bounties, inhabited by a princely race of men, but cursed and dominated by the most abominable tax laws that ever oppressed a free people. [Applause.] It is high time indeed that the American people become alarmed at the growth of monopoly. The trusts raise the price of what they sell whenever they choose to do so, and in the same manner lower the price of what they buy. The farmer, the mechanic, the consumer is utterly helpless. They persecute and crush out those who would refuse to become a part of their unlawful combination. No single individual or concern can stand out against them. If he dares attempt it, like a plague they surround him with the damning blight of lower prices. In particular instances and in particular localities, so long as it is necessary, they will sell their own products at a loss in order to put the independent out of business. Their chief partner in this unholy warfare has been and is to-day the Republican party and its high protective tariff. Not a man of you can deny the truth of the assertion that your protective tariff does shut out competition from abroad and does thereby make easier the problem of combination and monopoly. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

In glowing terms your President invites under his banner "all those who are ready to fight for the righteousness that exalteth a nation." That righteousness, Mr. Chairman, consists first in the enactment of laws which afford to every man an equal opportunity in the struggle for subsistence.

The President repeatedly speaks of the things that have been done and of the things that he is seeking to do to-day, but he is ominously silent respecting our system of taxation, which all just men know is responsible largely for the abominable conditions which exist. This mighty scourge will never pass away so long as the wage-earner is forced to buy the necessaries of life from a corporation which not only fixes the price of these necessaries of subsistence, but fixes the price of his wages as well. This mighty scourge will not pass away so long as the farmer is compelled to buy from the trust and to sell what he produces to the trust, which of its own volition fixes the price of both what he buys and what he sells. This mighty scourge will pass away when, and only when, every man is accorded an equal opportunity by and before the law, when God's law of supply and demand, untrammeled in its operation, is permitted to fix prices and when the many are no longer taxed to enrich the few. I would not contend that a revision of your present tariff schedules will bring about the full consummation of this beneficent condition, but I do contend that it is nothing less than criminal to allow your trusts and monopolies to prey upon the American people absolutely immune and protected from all competition. Our Republican friends themselves have admitted as much by their action in this very Chamber.

A few years ago we had in this country a terrible coal famine. In some cities the price of coal rose to $24 per ton. It is said that 70 per cent of the coal of this country is controlled by half a dozen railway systems. There was a difference between the operators and the miners, or rather, I should say, between the coal trust and its employees. The result was there was much suffering throughout the land. In that dark hour what did your party in this Chamber do? You brought in a bill repealing the import duty of 67 cents per ton upon foreign coal. You admitted that that was the best you could do under the circumstances and all you could do, but you did it, and when you repealed that import duty upon coal, which was put there in the interest of the coal trust, you found yourselves in the position your President has so often of late found himself, to wit, vindicating the principles of the Democratic party, which you are so fond of saying is incompetent and unfit to administer the affairs of this nation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There are two practical ways to deal with monopoly: First, remove the protection it now enjoys against competition; second, put in the penitentiary men who persist in violating our antitrust laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, for more than ten years the Democratic party has been protesting against these very conditions which the President admits exists to-day. The oppression of these trusts is nothing new. The "corrupt men of vast wealth," the "many wealthy malefactors," the "very wealthy criminals," the "corporations robbing the people"—these have existed for years. They are not a product of the year 1908 or 1907. They have been holding high carnival for years, unchecked, unbridled, unwhipped of justice. In 1896 you had the audacity to charge these conditions to two years of Democratic rule. In your platform that year you summarized all the woes of this country, and solemnly reminded the people that in a time of profound peace Mr. Grover Cleveland, a Democratic President, had issued bonds. It is remarkable how silent our Republican friends have now become respecting bond issues in time of peace. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] In the year 1900 your platform was exceedingly short. It was composed of two words: "Stand pat." Where, oh, where, in all this land, is the Republican to be found to-day who is willing to echo these two words, so popular in the year 1900, "stand pat?" Is there a single Republican in this House to-day who is willing to rise in his seat here and now and tell the country that he is willing to stand pat? No doubt that deep down in your hearts some of you still believe that was a good platform, because upon it you rode to victory. Stand pat comes down to us as a dying echo never again to be repeated by any Republican, unless a reactionary shall be nominated at Chicago. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

But what do you say about all these conditions of which your President speaks in his message to-day? How about your wealthy malefactors? How about your corrupt men of vast wealth? How about the Standard Oil trust and its oppression of the people? How about your corporations desiring to rob the people? How about all these terrible conditions of which your President speaks in his message? Is there a single man in this Chamber who will charge that the Democratic party is responsible for the existence now of these corporations and these criminals? What laws did we pass during the two years we were in power which made these things possible? Mr. Chairman, when the President framed that indictment, the prisoner in the criminal's dock was his own party. No other party could be responsible, for he and his party have enjoyed uninterrupted power from the 4th day of March, 1897, down to the present time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, one of the most amazing statements which has been made upon this floor was uttered by our very genial friend from the State of Michigan in the concluding sentence of his speech, delivered in this Chamber some days ago. "The policies of Theodore Roosevelt," declared he, "were conceived in patriotism and born of Republican parentage." This statement was followed by applause on the Republican side of this Chamber. The railroad rate bill, considered one of the most important measures which has become a law during the last six years, our friend contends is a Republican measure, pure and simple. In the first place, I will say that surely our friend has forgotten the fate of a bill which in part bore his own name.

In the Fifty-eighth Congress that gentleman achieved early and enviable distinction in having his name attached as joint author of the railroad-rate bill, which, during that Congress, almost unanimously passed this House. Why did that bill not become a law? His party had an overwhelming majority in this Chamber and in the Chamber at the other end of this building. The President stood with pen in hand ready to affix his signature. But the Esch-Townsend bill never became a law. It died in the committee room of a Republican Senate. But during all these years, bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, the Republican party has been anxious (?) to enact into law railroad-rate legislation which would guarantee to every shipper a "square deal."

Then, again, in the Fifty-ninth Congress what happened? Remember, Mr. Chairman, that the Republican party was still anxious to regulate railroads. After much investigation, what was known as the "Hepburn bill" was reported. It was not entirely satisfactory to this side of the Chamber, but it was the best legislation we could get. I was one of those who did not believe that it would afford adequate relief to the small shipper, and rising in my place upon this floor, I undertook to warn the country that the bill would afford no relief whatever to the small shipper unless it conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to pass upon any rate or practice of its own initiative. My eloquent friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who will, I believe, be Speaker of the next House of Representatives [loud applause on the Democratic side], did me the honor to listen to the remarks I made at that time.

It is, of course, now gratifying to me to read in the message of the President the suggestion that the Interstate Commerce Commission should be empowered to pass upon any rate or practice upon its own initiative, and that it should also be provided by law that whenever the Commission has reason to believe that a proposed advance in a rate ought not to be made without investigation it should have authority to issue an order prohibiting the advance pending the examination. I deem it only proper to say just here that I was represented in certain newspapers as being opposed to the Hepburn bill. I never was opposed to it, but was heartily in favor of the best legislation I could get. I did warn the country at that time that, so far as the small shipper was concerned, the Hepburn rate bill would amount to but little. I leave it to that class of shippers to decide whether I prophesied correctly. I think my friend from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] did the same thing. Of course, it must be gratifying to him, as it is to me, to see our position vindicated now by the President of the United States in a message to the Congress.

But I am diverted from my subject just for the moment. During all of this time, bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, the Republican party was exceedingly anxious (?) for railroad-rate legislation. Well, the bill passed the House almost unanimously. It went to the Senate, and then what happened? I assert here and now that all of the opposition to that measure in the Senate, with possibly one or two exceptions, was confined to the ranks of the Republican party.

I challenge any man to rise now and dispute the truth of this assertion. Day after day passed, and the bill was not reported out of the committee. Weeks passed, and still the bill was not reported out of the committee. Oh, how anxious the Republican party was for railroad-rate legislation, and when the bill was reported who had charge of it? The chairman of the committee which had it under consideration? The man whom the country would naturally expect to have charge of the fate of the bill on the floor of the Senate? Not at all, Mr. Chairman, not at all. When the bill was reported to the Senate, lo and behold the country witnessed the strange spectacle of this important measure put in the hands of a minority Senator, a distinguished Democrat from the State of South Carolina. So anxious has been the Republican party for the enactment of some legislation regulating the practices of our great railway systems that not one word has ever been recorded in a Republican platform demanding it. A Democratic candidate for President has been demanding it for years. A distinguished Democrat from the State of Texas was the author of the first bill which ever passed Congress which attracted the attention of the country. Democrats fought all these years to get legislation guaranteeing a "square deal" to every shipper, whether he ships by the ton or by the carload. But, according to our friend from Michigan, the Republican party is entitled to the credit for the enactment of this legislation. "It was conceived in patriotism, born of Republican parentage," nevertheless the Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN, of South Carolina, was the physician who presided at the birth of this infant, when, after many trials and tribulations and many days of peril, it saw the light of the Senate Chamber in the Fifty-ninth Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, just a word in conclusion, inasmuch as my time has almost expired. I have observed with regret recently a disposition on the part of certain gentlemen on the other side of the aisle to attempt to revive issues long ago settled and prejudices long ago buried. We live in a new era. Any attempt to wave the bloody shirt in this Chamber will not divert the attention of the people of this Republic from great problems pressing on us for solution.

The leaders of both the great political parties are great and, I believe, good men. They are not dissimilar in some respects. I cheerfully concede to the President honesty and sincerity of purpose. It ill becomes any gentleman here to attempt to ridicule one of the greatest and best men this generation has produced, William J. Bryan, the leader of the Democratic party. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

There is one great difference in the position occupied by these two men with respect to the political parties which they are leading. One is attempting certain reforms through party leaders who have little sympathy for the reforms he is advocating; the other has behind him the rank and file of a great party whose representatives here almost to a man are in full sympathy with the reforms he is advocating. In this campaign, under the leadership of this man for the third time, we shall appeal directly to the voters of this nation.

A prominent Republican facetiously remarked the other day that Bryan is the best asset the Republican party has at present. Yes; he is the best asset this nation has in one individual citizen. Whether he shall ever occupy the highest office in the gift of the people of this nation or not, he has lived to see what few statesmen have ever lived to see in the history of the world—his reforms advocated by his political opponent, the present occupant of the Presidential chair. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

> No life
> Can be pure in its purpose and strong in its strife
> And all life not be purer and stronger thereby.

This man has been twice defeated—once fairly, once unfairly, as I believe—and the great office of President is filled by another of different political faith. He is but a private citizen, yet his strong personality and his influence for good are felt all over this land, even by Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, in connection with the remarks made by me this morning, a certain table in regard to industrial conditions, which has been prepared by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WEISSE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to insert as a part of his remarks a table which has been prepared by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WEISSE]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, an amendment will be offered to this bill at the proper time, to incorporate in the provisions of the bill under consideration the bill H. R. 10518, entitled "A bill for the better equipment and instruction of State coast artillery organizations," introduced by myself, and it is in support of that amendment that I am now addressing the committee.

EQUIPMENT FOR HEAVY GUNS TO BE LOANED TO THE STATES.

The amendment to be offered provides that the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to such of the States as maintain coast artillery organizations fire-control equipment, the apparatus so loaned to be placed by the States in their various armories, where it can be accessible at all times to their troops and continuously used by the latter in their drills. The sum of $25,000 is provided for the purchase of this equipment. The title to the property so furnished remains in the United States, and the property at all times will be subject to the call of the United States, so that in the event of war it can be taken by the Government and placed where most needed in the forts of our coast defenses.

This amendment provides so necessary an aid to our military strength that it should be embodied in the bill. The Coast Artillery forms a most important adjunct to the defenses of our country, and it is to it that the country looks to protect our seacoast cities in the event of war. Not alone for the sake of the inhabitants of the cities, but to prevent as well an enemy from using our harbors as a base is the Coast Artillery needed in our general plan of protection.

Congress, which has now adopted a method of yearly appropriations for the coast defenses, has appropriated already for the United States and insular possessions about $84,000,000. It was originally the opinion of the board which planned the defenses that at least one complete manning detail for all the guns mounted should be provided in times of peace, and it is thought that in times of war two, and possibly three, reliefs will be found necessary.

PRESENT FORCE LESS THAN ONE-HALF OF THE NUMBER REQUIRED TO WORK THE GUNS.

The present law fails to provide in a sufficient manner for the manning of these defenses. The National Coast-Defense Board estimate that there will be required for the defenses of the United States alone, as now completed and projected, 47,709 men, and, should the insular possessions be included, there would be required 55,110 men for one complete manning detail for all our defenses, as finished and projected. The total authorized maximum enlisted strength of the Coast Artillery at the present time is 19,321 men, and of this number 4,970 men are required for manning details for the mines, searchlights, and power plants to be operated in connection with the harbor defenses. Deducting these necessary men, therefore, we find that under the maximum enlistment there remain 14,351 men authorized by law for manning all the guns now actually mounted in the fortifications of the entire country. One complete detail for these guns, however, requires the number of 36,863 men, so that the maximum number of men now authorized for gun defenses is 4,080 short of one-half of one complete manning detail for the guns already mounted in the United States.

The annual report of the Chief of Artillery of the United States Army for 1907 expresses the belief that one-half of one complete manning detail in time of peace is sufficient, and that the remaining one-half could be provided by the States, could they be induced to organize coast artillery reserve corps and such corps be given an opportunity to take part in the annual coast artillery maneuvers. It is the purpose of this amendment to furnish to these States equipment to enable them to fit men for efficient service in the harbor defenses in that detail. Militiamen familiar with the guns would constitute a reserve which could be quickly called out and formed at the defenses, and the development of this branch of the militia service has been for several years urged by the War Department. The report of the Secretary of War, 1902, says:

> Manning the coast defenses is constitutional militia work, for it is always to repel invasion. It can be undertaken by citizens living in the neighborhood of the fortifications with less disturbance and sacrifice than any other military duty, because it does not take them far away from their homes and their business.

MILITIA WOULD FURNISH ONE-HALF THE SOLDIERS FOR OUR COAST DEFENSES.

The heavy guns, however, have equipment for fire control which is in itself intricate, and the complete mastery of which is absolutely necessary in any body of men undertaking the defenses of the fortifications. Drilling regularly in the armories, the Coast Artillery have an opportunity to use this apparatus but once a year during their service on the defenses, and the proposal of this bill is to provide the equipment which can be placed in the armories and used by the men through the winter, so that by familiarity with it they can better profit by the summer experience with the regulars, and more particularly become properly trained in the use of the equipment they will be called upon to handle in the event of war.

HEAVY GUNS REQUIRE EXPERIENCED MEN TO OPERATE THEM.

The Coast Artillery developed in this way will furnish to the United States a group of men of exceptional qualifications, accustomed to drill on the guns, and who will be at all times maintained for the National Government at comparatively no expense. The Government has already asked the cooperation of the States in forming these reserves, and last year all the coast States except three accepted the invitation of the Government to send coast-defense men to take part in the joint maneuvers.

The organized militia of our States is recruited from men of exceptional qualifications as soldiers. Their records in the past show that, and the reports to-day of Regular Army officers show that the hard and painstaking work of the militia organizations has already produced bodies of excellently qualified soldiers.

MEMBERS OF MILITIA EXCEPTIONALLY QUALIFIED.

Composed only of those who have chosen to enlist from motives of patriotism and interest in the work, our militiamen have the highest qualifications for soldiers, and make up by their enthusiasm and willingness for the experience which lack of opportunity for drill necessarily deprives them of. Hard and conscientious work is done by the members of the militia forces to qualify themselves to defend the people of our country. The National Government should take every step to stimulate this interest and to aid the members of the militia in producing the highest results from their self-imposed tasks.

In sending in an approval of my bill (H. R. 10518) the War Department, in House Document No. 674, Sixtieth Congress, said:

> The amount of this estimate is urgently needed to provide for the proper instruction and equipment of State coast artillery troops.

A provision to aid in the instruction of our State troops who would be specially detailed for home defenses in the cities, approved by the War Department as well as by the Committee on Military Affairs, this amendment should be embodied as an essential part of the military appropriation bill.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, the fact that this bill carries an appropriation of about three-quarters of a million dollars for barracks and quarters for our army in the Philippine Islands calls to my mind the importance of the question as to what is to be the future policy of this Government as to those islands.

Because I agree with him on the subject and because I regard his presentation of it as not only eloquent but able, I desire to print as a part of my remarks a speech recently made at Boston, Mass., by my friend from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? The Chair hears no objection.

The speech is as follows:

NEUTRALIZATION AND INDEPENDENCE FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Ladies and Gentlemen:

An invitation to meet a Boston audience in historic Faneuil Hall was a temptation that I could not resist. It readily overcame scruples that arose from consciousness of my great imperfection as a public speaker. However, I plead in extenuation that it is unusual for a man from the far Southwest to find himself in perfect sympathy with a political movement which, although it originated in the consciences and minds of good Americans everywhere, finds its form and expression here in the very center of New England. I hope it may be taken to mean that everywhere in this great country of ours, all the way across it from Plymouth Rock to the Alamo, there are plenty of good American citizens who believe that it is still worth while to go on striving to show that a nation is only exalted through righteousness. New England and the South, Massachusetts and Texas, ought to be able to work together for the glory of the common country, for in its time each has made sacrifices for liberty and for right. Both have written glorious chapters in the history of our common country. We, like you, feel a pride in our heroic past. Like you, we glory in the deeds done by the mighty men who were our ancestors. Against your Bunker Hill, Lexington, and Concord I proudly place the Alamo, Goliad, and San Jacinto. By the side of your Nathan Hale, who regretted that he did not have a thousand lives to give his country, I shall be so prodigal as to put Travis, Bowie, and Crockett and their hundred and seventy followers, every man of whom died that Anglo-Saxon liberty might be set up on the Spanish-American border.

Surely the faith that sustained these men through great efforts, even unto death, must be kept alive, and I am delighted to have you, as fellow-laborers, in a cause so worthy.

It is reasonable to assume, Mr. Chairman, that nearly every person in this audience is anxious to have our Government divorced from colonial enterprises in Asia. Indeed, as I understand the situation, we are assembled here for the specific purpose of considering one plan of separation out of several that have been suggested by enterprising and patriotic thinkers. While holding the common view that we ought to get out of our embarrassing situation in the Orient, we have not hitherto been united on any particular plan and, I dare say, have not yet reached a unanimous agreement.

Although I subscribe to the doctrine of neutralization for the Philippine Islands, I feel it my duty to say that it has only been my second choice of the several methods of separation that have been suggested. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that I am not with the majority of this audience in my position, but that fact does not greatly disturb me, for I have the habit of landing with the minority—a habit that is distressingly difficult to throw off. Under the circumstances I feel that I ought to briefly state some of the reasons why I have not thought that neutralization is the very best plan for breaking the political tie that binds us to the Philippine Islands. At the same time I want to say that the separation is so important that I am ready to sink my personal views and stand with the majority on any platform that will bring it about. My single objection to the neutralization scheme is that it does not go far enough. It is a compromise. I have also preferred my plan to that of neutralization because the latter will be, to a degree, an entangling foreign alliance, the sort of political association against the dangers of which George Washington, with a clear and prophetic vision, warned us.

The wisdom of the first President is established by all current political history. For months the newspapers—the jaundiced ones leading in the cry—have been telling us of the probability of war with Japan, a suggestion so absurd that it ought not to disturb the rest of the most timid citizen. However, unthinking and ill-informed people have been excited by these publications and have worked themselves into such a frenzy that they have indulged in much intemperate speech and vehement abuse of a friendly nation. Such talk under other circumstances might provoke war. If the conditions were different, if Japan were perfectly solvent and had entirely recovered from her last great war, such conduct on the part of our citizens might easily provoke a conflict. Absurd as it is, this talk of war has had the effect of confirming me in my position, for I believe that if we did not have political interests on the China Sea, in other words, if we did not have in our keeping the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands, there would be no more danger of trouble between Japan and the United States than there is of an armed conflict between this country and the Swiss Republic.

This illustrates my thought that we have run into one of the dangers that Washington warned us against.

The occupation of those islands brings us close to Japan, an oriental power already developed, and near to China, a country potentially great in a military way and sure to be reckoned with in the future. By reason of that proximity to these two countries we now find ourselves in the zone of war probabilities. I invite the scorn of "jingoes" and risk being called a "weakling" by saying that I earnestly desire to avoid the possibility of war in that part of the world, a war that would undoubtedly and solely be due to our occupation of the Philippine Islands. If we had no territory beyond Hawaii there would certainly be no talk of war and we would be left free to develop trade, and in the exchange of our products for theirs we could promote friendly and profitable relations with the people of China and Japan.

I am ready to admit that neutralization would greatly reduce if it did not entirely destroy all probability of an armed conflict with either of those countries, and for that reason I shall support it. However, I would prefer an absolute and unconditional separation of our political interests from those of the Filipinos, and to save me I can see no reason why it should not be done. I believe that the world would applaud it as an unparalleled act of generosity if we should say to the Filipinos that they must immediately arrange to set up their own government, that after five years we would present them with their independence (something that we never had any moral right to take from them), and that therefore they must protect themselves and their sovereignty. Five years would be ample notice to the world and its traders that after that time they must rely upon the Philippine government for protection. I do not recall an instance in history where a strong government has ever presented their sovereignty and territory to a weaker people. It would be a glorious precedent in generosity that I should like for the United States to make. And, furthermore, I would not ask the Philippine people to repay the $20,000,000 we paid when we bought them from the Spanish Government, for I doubt if they could do it, unless some liberty-loving Crœsus came to their rescue. Besides, how absurd it is to consider the paltry twenty millions originally paid in view of the hundreds of millions since squandered and the scores of millions we pay out every year because we are in the islands.

CONCERNED FOR AMERICANS.

While I would do this act of justice to the Philippine people, my concern is not so much for them as for the Americans. I do not want to see our simple, peace-loving democracy changed into a strenuous empire, oppressive to the taxpayer and conducted for the glory of military men on land and sea, nor for the waging of wars of conquest against any people on earth.

By practical statesmen the money cost of this policy should also be considered and the man who pays ought not to be entirely forgotten, as he appears to have been since we developed the lust of the conqueror.

Then there is another view of the question that ought to be considered. Any government that is to be strong and have a contented people ought to be homogeneous. The possession of the Philippine Islands adds ten million or more absolutely alien people to the mixed races who now yield more or less willing allegiance to our flag. Socially they would not elevate the United States; commercially, when the cost is considered, they are a negligible quantity, and politically they are and always will be a source of trouble. I do not say these things out of any unkindness to the Filipinos, but venture to call attention to them because I am considering the effect of the association on the character and the future of our own people. The social view of it specially disturbs me. All my life I have lived in the shadow of great ethical and social problems growing out of racial differences and it is impossible to avoid the thought that these will be complicated and developed by adding another race question.

I hope that in this connection I may be permitted to say that I can not be persuaded that the recent troubles in California and Canada are purely commercial. The people of neither State would indulge in rioting and arson just because they feared the competition of a handful of Orientals. Both are too resourceful, too self-reliant, for that. It is certainly racial, as so broad an observer and so rampant an imperialist as Rudyard Kipling recently suggested. That also was largely the trouble during the three hundred and seventy-five years that Spain occupied the archipelago and such it will be with us to the end.

If every man, woman, and child in the Philippine Archipelago were as anxious to be associated with us politically as they now appear anxious not to be, I should still oppose it, because in the end it would work discord and trouble. This is not to say that they are inferior, but different.

Mr. Chairman, I have some familiarity with the Latin-Americans. They are much nearer to us racially than the Filipinos, yet even they would abhor the idea of being tied up with us in the same government. It is because they also are different. They would prefer what we in our arrogance call Latin misrule to Anglo-Saxon order. Now, if that is so of these people, who are more or less nearly kin to us, how much more is it true of a people so absolutely alien as the Filipinos? I do not doubt, although the Secretary of War holds a different view, that they would prefer political association with other Orientals. Secretary Taft, in a speech at Tokio on the 30th of September, said that Japan did not want the Philippines and that we could not sell them without violating our obligations to the Filipinos. Can Mr. Taft be so very certain that the Japanese do not want the islands? While the archipelago is too thickly populated to invite white immigration, even if the climate permitted a residence there, the islands are sparsely populated, as compared with Japan itself, and offer opportunities for getting a living that the crowded Japanese would no doubt be glad to have.

Diplomatic protestations therefore are not convincing, and I dare say the Japanese would like to have the islands, and if the truth were known I believe the Filipinos would prefer Japanese to American control. Why shouldn't they? They are the same sort of people physically and are, I suppose, of a common origin. With these two there would soon be a physical as well as a political amalgamation and harmony would ensue, if harmony is ever possible in the Tropics. We can not amalgamate them physically, which brings us back to my statement that further association of alien races under the same government is a mistake that in the end will be a calamity.

AS A BUSINESS PROPOSITION.

Now that the wave of prosperity seems to be receding, I hope the people may be induced to consider this question from the common-sense business point of view.

That great captain of industry, Admiral Dewey, basing his observations, I suppose, on a long and intimate knowledge of trade and its movements, says that the United States must have an oriental outpost for commercial and naval purposes. Very likely we do need naval stations—coal depots, anyhow—in Asiatic waters, and on that point I am willing to have the Admiral's statement go unchallenged; but when he ventures into the field of commerce I think his assertions are absurd. He says, among other startling things: "If Japan owned the Philippines she would command every gateway to the Orient, and the United States would be completely shut out." He leaves us to infer that if Japan owned the islands she would keep vast fleets heavily armed lying in wait for our commercial ships and either capture the ships and take them and the cargoes they carry as booty or, like Tarifa, the Mediterranean pirate, exact a heavy tribute for the privilege of doing business. The suggestion is thrilling and offers a fine field for the exercise of the imagination of sensational writers of fiction. But shall we believe that such acts of piracy would be aimed only at the United States and that they alone of all trading nations of the world would be "completely shut out?" Would the great powers of Europe that have a relatively important trade with the Philippines permit such an outrage and is there anything in the latter-day history of Japan to warrant the belief that she would undertake such a folly? It is easy to sit in an office at Washington and make broad assertions about this or that consequence flowing from certain conceded facts—much easier, indeed, than to show that they will occur—but I would rather have reasons and proof than general statements unsupported by history or common sense. As an argument for the enlargement of the Navy, the Admiral's assertions have their value and may command respect, but they do not illuminate the trade questions that perplex our men of business.

The Philippines are off the line of trade between the United States and China, for example, which is the most important of the oriental markets. It would be hundreds of miles out of the way to send goods by Manila to Shanghai or Yokohama, and no merchant with sense enough to keep out of the bankruptcy court would think of sending his merchandise to the Philippines to be distributed thence to the mainland.

These theoretical captains of industry who have learned business from the quarterdeck of a battle ship ought to know that trade always follows the lines of least resistance, and in this case the shortest mileage and the smallest cost for coal and wages show us where those lines are. Manila may have strategic value as a naval base, but it does not now possess and, in my judgment, never will have any commanding importance as a commercial center, except possibly for the distribution of goods to the archipelago itself; and the trade of the Philippines we find on examination is not very important after all. Surely it is not worth the sacrifice of a principle. Take away the value of the stuff we send out for our Army, the clothes we put on the backs of our soldiers, the food with which we supply their hunger, and especially the drink with which we make a vain effort to allay their tropical thirst, and there is not so very much traffic between the United States and what some people unctuously call our "island possessions," with greedy emphasis on "possessions."

Before engaging in any business venture it behooves the prudent man of affairs to consider the cost of the undertaking. If this rule had been invoked before we entered upon the Philippine enterprise, it never would have been undertaken as a business venture. If rigidly and honestly applied now, it would compel an immediate abandonment of the whole wicked and foolish scheme.

As it never will be possible to tell with absolute accuracy how much of the increase of the size and expense of the Army and Navy of the United States is due to the occupation of the islands, it is, of course, impossible to state what the cost of the colony has been.

On this point and in reply to a resolution of the Senate in 1902, the Secretary of War reported that the cost of the Army in the Philippines from June 30, 1898, to May 1, 1902, had been $169,853,512. To this let us add $114,515,643, the admitted cost of the Army in the Philippines from May 1, 1902, to June 30, 1907, and we will have a grand total of $284,369,155. That does not take into account the additional cost of the Navy.

That eminent patriot and statesman, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, Mr. HALE, of Maine, has said publicly that the appropriation for the support of the Navy has been increased many millions each year because of our occupany of the Philippines, and he is in a position to know. Since 1902 we have spent over three and one-quarter millions of dollars for barracks and quarters for the troops in the Philippines and about the same amount on naval stations. For coast defenses and fortifications we have spent about three and one-half million dollars since 1898.

These figures, which even the friends of the Asiatic venture will admit are conservative, make the vast total of $291,119,155, and, mind you, they do not take into account the increased cost of the Navy.

While your own distinguished fellow-citizen, Mr. Endicott, was Secretary of War a plan for the erection of American coast defenses was considered and adopted. It is now about three-fourths completed. When finished it will have cost about $200,000,000, a vast sum, but one that the American taxpayer cheerfully contributes, for it is to defend his home. But now it is proposed to extend this coast-defense project to the Asiatic colony and to expend more than $8,000,000 in erecting fortifications at only two places in the Philippine Islands, Manila and Subig Bay.

It would take the skill of an Edward Atkinson to figure out the cost of an adequate coast defense for each of the more than a thousand islands that go to make up the Philippine Archipelago. The sums are too great for me to undertake the task.

All these enormous expenses are properly chargeable against the Philippine trade that some people value so highly and value all the more the less they know about it. These figures show the utter folly of the Asiatic colony as a business venture.

More than eight of each ten men one speaks to about it promptly admit that the conquest of the Philippine Islands was an economic blunder, if not a political crime. Then, if it is apt to embroil us with powers that have heretofore been friendly, if it does not pay from a commercial view point, and if our interference is not wanted by the natives, why, in Heaven's name, should we persist in forcing ourselves on them?

There is in this country a very small class of altruists, headed, I honestly believe, by the Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, that sincerely and earnestly desires to lift the Filipinos from their own civilization into ours. They so sincerely and earnestly desire it that they would imperil the peace of the world and wreck the Treasury of the United States to promote their fads, but they are so few that they must be lonesome. Take away the preachers, who look upon the Philippine Islands as a promising missionary field to be spiritually exploited under the American flag, and the number of people who are disinterestedly in favor of continuing the American occupation of the islands is small. The balance of us who support the project are in it for what there is to be made out of it. We want timber lands, sugar and rice plantations, and public-service franchises, although, as a rule, we do not publicly admit it.

I honestly believe that if the right to exploit their own territory were restricted to the Filipinos, a large number of noisy patriots would subside as quickly as did a friend of mine in 1899, who disapproved of my position on this question. He was vehement in his declaration that I was all wrong, and repeatedly said that we must retain the islands. I asked him why he was so anxious to keep them. "Because," he said, "they are rich in timber and fertile lands, and we want both." I then asked him how we were to get such property from the resident owners. "Haven't we conquered the Filipinos, and can't we take them?" was his reply. I told him that brutal as war is, it is no longer conducted as it was in the days of Hannibal, Cæsar, or William of Normandy, and that conquerors were compelled by the rules of modern warfare to respect private rights and ownership. "Don't we get their lands?" he asked. "Not unless we pay for them," I told him. "Then to the devil with the Philippines," and from that day to this he has been a good anti-imperialist.

Mr. Chairman, the higher view of this question has been kept before the American public for years by the association under whose auspices we are assembled here to-day. That association has never ceased to call attention to certain noble sentiments that hitherto have been regarded as peculiarly American. Until lust for land and power tempted us to colonial ventures in Asia there was universal approval of the essentially American maxim that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed. I hate to think that it has been abandoned and that this noble view of the rights of men is less respected than formerly, but mere protestations of regard for it are not convincing when set against the facts of recent history.

While we fail to square our conduct in the Philippines with our doctrines in America, Europe looks on and sneers. To an American who loves his country and wants to see her right, absolutely and ideally right, the position is intolerable. We must therefore go on with this work until we can make the public appreciate the enormity of the offense against basic American principles.

The doctrine of the square deal, of which we now hear so much, is best stated in the seventh chapter of Saint Matthew: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets."

The heroic and just men who fought and died at Lexington and Bunker Hill, at Kings Mountain and Yorktown, would never have denied its application to Manila while they demanded it for Massachusetts and Virginia.

On another occasion when the New England conscience was stirred to its depths your great philosopher and poet sang:

"United States! the ages plead,
Present and past in undersong,
Go put your creed into your deed,
Nor speak with double tongue."

"For sea and land don't understand,
Nor skies without a frown
See rights, for which the one hand fights,
By the other cloven down."

We call this the commercial age. We boast of our mighty trade and swell with pride at the rows of figures that show the wonderful total of our exports and imports. And when we consider how in the eager haste to get money we have not hesitated to trample on human rights heretofore held sacred by all Americans we see that it is a commercial age. The country has been gorged with wealth. We gloat like misers over our possessions, but are we just and do we apply in the Philippines the laws we demand for the United States? I fear not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, Mr. Chairman, while there is a great deal of difference among the people as to what should be our future policy as to the Philippines, I apprehend there will be absolutely no difference of opinion on the question that so long as we do hold those islands life and property ought to be protected and order preserved without reference to the political effect that might thereby be produced in this country.

I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read a communication in reference to this subject, recently received by me from Judge James H. Blount, of Georgia. Let me say that Mr. Blount is a gentleman of the highest character and of unquestioned veracity; he was first an Army officer, stationed in the Philippines, and afterwards a judge of the court of first instance in those islands, a position that he voluntarily resigned, after creditable and satisfactory service. He is a distinguished member of the Georgia bar, and is the son of a gentleman who was for many years an honored Member of this House, and long the chairman of its Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The communication is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 13, 1908.

Hon. THOMAS W. HARDWICK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: One year ago to-day you were kind enough to write me stating that our good friend, Mr. SLAYDEN of Texas, had on the day before, February 12, in the course of a speech on the floor of the House, caused to be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, an article by the undersigned previously published in the North American Review of January 18, 1907, urging Philippine independence at a fixed date in the future. The keynote of Mr. SLAYDEN'S speech was in the following language:

"There are very few men of even the most moderate information, no matter what their political faith may be, who are not ready to admit that the monumental blunder of our history was the annexation of those islands."

The keynote of the North American Review article to which your letter referred was that the Philippines might be protected from outside interference by a neutralization treaty—a treaty negotiated with all the other great powers by the President at the request of Congress, whereby the powers would agree to recognize the independence of the islands so soon as the same should be granted to them by the United States. This is what is contemplated in three different resolutions now pending before the present Congress, one introduced in the House by an eminent Republican, the Hon. SAMUEL W. MCCALL, of Massachusetts, another introduced in the House by the Democratic leader, Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, and a third in the Senate by Senator STONE, of Missouri.

I have a letter from Hon. William Jennings Bryan, received about the same time your own letter above mentioned was received, in which Mr. Bryan expresses the belief "that neutralization is desirable and also possible."

If thus protected from outside interference, the people of this country can rest assured the Filipinos would not kill any more of each other than we have had to kill of them in the process of "benevolent assimilation."

Another principal point in the North American Review article, which was the subject of your letter, was, in effect, that as one of the most distinguished Congressmen who have visited the islands said after returning home:

"I have little or no doubt that there are a sufficient number of wise and intelligent Filipinos to establish and maintain a government in the Philippines that will compare in liberality and effectiveness with a very great many of the governments that have been in successful operation for a century or more."

Such a government, even if called a republic, would probably be more of an oligarchy than anything else, but, at any rate, it would be a government with the consent of the governed.

In the article to which your letter referred the statement was made that—

"Looked at from the oriental end of the line, the governing of the Philippines by their supposed friends from the antipodes has been not unlike a game of battledore and shuttlecock between rival political creeds at home, in which the unfortunate inhabitants have been the shuttlecock;" that, for instance, from July to November, 1904, the province of Samar, which is the third largest island of the Philippine Archipelago, was being overrun by several thousand brigands representing primarily the embers of the late war fanned into flame by the exactions of the taxgatherer and the usurer, and in less than one hundred days more than 50,000 people had been made homeless by their depredations, according to the sworn testimony of a constabulary officer of the province who appeared as a witness before my court.

Then came a specific charge that the situation was not turned over to the military authorities because it was the eve of a Presidential election in the United States, and the civil authorities, particularly the chief of the constabulary police, did not like to admit that the public disorder in the Philippines was too great for the constabulary—the right arm of the civil government—to handle.

It is obviously important for the party in power to convince the American people that the Philippine government has been in all respects a success. No government can claim to be a success which, hampered by political considerations at home, fails properly to protect life and property. Public order could have been quickly restored in Samar at any time between August and November preceding the last Presidential election by ordering out the Fourteenth Infantry, which was three hours away from the scene of the massacre in question, or the Eighteenth Infantry, which was almost as near. Brig. Gen. W. H. Carter, then commanding our troops in that part of the archipelago, knows this as well as I do—so do the officers of the Fourteenth and Eighteenth Infantry, but it would be unsoldierly conduct for them to criticise the Administration.

The North American Review article to which your letter referred received considerable circulation and must have been read by some of the Republican leaders, but for a long time its statements were not denied. At last one of them has denied that they "played politics" in the Philippines. Hence this letter. If it does no other good, it may prevent a repetition of the offense. You can well understand that it is not pleasant to raise an issue such as this, because it means possible estrangement from personal friends, but the issue must be met that the public mind may be disabused of the notion that the Philippine government is a nonpartisan affair, merely because distinguished gentlemen originally Democrats have had to do with its guidance.

In the North American Review for December, 1907, Hon. Henry C. Ide, recently governor-general of the Philippine Islands, replies to the article hereinbefore referred to, namely, the one which appeared in the North American Review for January 18, 1907, and also to another article of mine along the same lines which appeared in the number of that magazine for June 21, 1907. In that reply he quotes from my June article a statement that the failure to order out the troops in Samar in the fall of 1904 was due to the fact that such action, cabled to the United States, might hurt the Administration in the Presidential election then approaching by creating an impression at home that the situation as to public order was not well in hand. Judge Ide then denies this in the following rather strong language:

"It is a moderate statement to say that this insinuation or direct charge is absolutely unfounded in fact, and furnishes a key to a considerable portion of Judge Blount's two articles. Either he was then laboring under the impression, from his proclivities as a Georgia Democrat, or he has since acquired the impression, that there was something sinister in the failure to make an early suspension of habeas corpus, and let the Army loose in the Province of Samar."

Judge Ide further says:

"It is inconceivable that the Commission could have been animated by the base and ignoble partisan prejudices thus charged against them."

I did not characterize the failure of the Commission to order out the military as "base and ignoble," nor will I attempt to characterize it at all now. I am not the judge in this case. It is for the American people to pass upon. Whatever else they do, it is devoutly to be wished that public opinion should so far awake from its apathy concerning the Philippines as to make it impossible to "play politics" out there any more.

I herewith inclose you a true copy of two letters, the originals of which you have already seen, which certainly demonstrate beyond the peradventure of a doubt that the tone of injured innocence assumed by Judge Ide has no justification.

The writer of these letters, Hon. George R. Harvey, assistant attorney-general of the Philippine Islands, was sent to Samar at the time indicated, at my request, to assist in disposing of a very large criminal docket. The brigands had been committing massacres of the peaceably inclined people within 4 or 5 miles of the provincial capital. Without going over the details of that dark and bloody period, suffice it to remark that as soon as Mr. Harvey had become acquainted with the serious nature of the situation and with the fact that the American Government was failing properly to protect life and property, I said to him: "Mr. Harvey, you see the situation; I think you will agree with me that if Mr. Roosevelt himself were here present and could see things as they are, he would order out the troops without regard to which way the chips might fly." Mr. Harvey said he would go back to Manila and earnestly recommend that the troops be ordered out for the protection of the peaceably inclined people. He returned to Manila, and after conferring with the authorities there, wrote me the two letters herewith inclosed. I am willing to submit them to any candid and ingenious mind in proof of the statement that—

"The failure to order out the troops was due to the fact that such action, cabled to the United States, might hurt the Administration in the Presidential election then approaching by creating at home an impression that the situation as to public order was not well in hand."

I remain as ever, very truly, your friend,

J. H. BLOUNT.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL
FOR THE CONSTABULARY,
Manila, P. I., October 15, 1904.

MY DEAR JUDGE: We arrived in Manila on Tuesday morning, the 11th instant, and I prepared my report and submitted it to the attorney-general on the 12th, in the meantime making a transcript of your summary and delivering a copy of same with other information to the attorney-general along with my report. After dictating the report and before delivering it I had a conversation with General Allen on the situation in Samar and told him what my recommendations would be. He agreed that rewards should be offered for the capture of Pablo Bulan, Antonio Anogar, and Pedro de la Cruz, but took issue on the other recommendations, and to my mind he takes a very extreme view; but I thought at the time and still think that he wanted to tone me down in my feelings in the matter. I think the real cause for his opposition is the effect that he fears an aggressive attitude might have on the Presidential election. In other words, whatever they do aggressively might be misconstrued and made use of as political capital.

At Governor Wright's request I got the report from the attorney-general before it was sent up and went over to the Malacanan, and the governor read the report and read most of the data that I submitted with the report, including your summary, and while he did not say much what he did say convinced me that there would be something doing if it were not on the eve of election, and in my opinion there will be things doing in Samar within thirty days.

I inclose herewith a copy of your summary, and also a copy of my report to the attorney-general. On the 18th instant I received your telegram to hold the completion of your summary until receipt of a letter mailed by you that day. I telegraphed you in reply that my report and your summary were placed in the hands of the attorney-general on the 12th instant. If there is any additional data in your letter mailed on the 13th I will submit it to the proper authorities.

For the lack of time I will close, and write more next time.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. R. HARVEY,
Assistant Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL
FOR THE CONSTABULARY,
Manila, P. I., October 19, 1904.

MY DEAR JUDGE BLOUNT: Since mailing my letter to you of last Saturday I have found the copies of your summary on the situation in Samar and inclose two herewith, in accordance with my promise.

This week we have received some good news from Samar with reference to important captures and killings of Pulajans. I am not in touch with what is going on with reference to Samar, and can give you no information along that line. As I remember, the governor told me the other day when I was talking with him that one more company of scouts will be sent down right away.

I sincerely hope the situation is improving, and that you are getting along rapidly in disposing of the large docket before you. If there is not a very great improvement in the situation by the 9th of November, I think there will be a considerable movement of troops in Samar within thirty days. For the good of the government, I hope the situation will improve materially before that time. I would like to see them put the troops there right now. I am of the opinion that it would not affect the election a half dozen votes, and it might save two or three or a half dozen massacres and the destruction of much property.

With best wishes for your success in your work, and with regards to Mr. Block, I am,

Very truly, yours,

GEO. R. HARVEY,
Assistant Attorney-General, Philippines Constabulary.

To Hon. JAMES H. BLOUNT,
Judge of First Instance, Catbalogan, Samar, P. I.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia if any gentleman on that side desires to occupy more time now?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Then I yield one hour to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I desire at this time to submit some remarks upon the subject of the currency. Much of what I shall say may appear to those who have made an exhaustive study of the subject as largely elementary. But my experience leads me to think that in the discussion of a great subject like this a reference to elementary principles is helpful to us all.

I regard the reform of our present currency system as the most important matter now before the country, and I therefore approach its discussion with some hesitation. I am very conscious that I do not know all about the subject. I have no financial hobby which I shall attempt to ride in this House, as I think there are several ways by which the present imperfections in our currency system could be corrected and such currency panics as we have recently passed through prevented. For more than twenty-five years through my business connections I have been more or less closely in touch with banks and the great business interests of the country, and much of what I shall say is based upon knowledge gained through my own experience. This lamp of experience, which I think the safest guide to my own feet, may not lighten any other man's pathway, but in the absence of direct experience of our own, other men's knowledge, some of it gained by the dearest experience, may be worth considering.

We Americans are so well pleased with ourselves and so accustomed to view everything we do or fail to do with complacency that we are apt to think that what we do or what we have in any given line is the best in the world. I have even heard it averred upon this floor that our present currency system is the best in the world.

Currency systems, like everything else in the world, must be judged by results. During my business life I have passed through two money or currency panics. The panic of 1893 did not commence with a currency famine and was vastly more than a money panic, but during its most acute period was attended by the worst money stringency I have ever experienced. The panic or flurry of 1907 was primarily a currency or money panic. Had our currency been such as would adjust itself to the needs of the business of the country, it never could have happened. It seems to me that a little reflection will convince anyone that this last statement is true. During the last fifteen years we have had, as I have stated, two money or currency panics, such times of currency famine that the business man could not get the currency to meet his pay rolls, because the banks did not have it and could not get it for him, no matter what his financial condition or what security he offered. During the same fifteen years, and for many years prior to 1893, there had been no such severe currency panic in any commercial nation in the world outside of our own country. There have been ups and downs in their commercial life, of course, but nothing like our currency famines or panics of 1893 and 1907.

Canada has such close business relations with this country as to be commercially almost a part of it. Her banks carry large balances in New York and our other large centers to nearly the same extent that our own lesser commercial centers and interior cities do. Yet our recent panic did not bring about a financial or money crisis in Canada. Under her excellent system the Canadan banks were able to supply all the currency that was needed and as rapidly as it was needed, and her business men hardly knew, except as they read of it in the papers, that we had a financial panic.

Judged, therefore, by results in the light of the experience of the world, our currency must be held to be the worst currency used to-day by any country pretending to commercial strength and wisdom. When we critically examine the inelastic, unscientific patchwork that we call our currency system, we can but wonder that working under it we have been able to accomplish such wonders with so few financial upheavals. Only the ability and ingenuity of our bankers and business men have made it possible. No other nation in the world has ever tried to copy our currency system—or lack of system, rather—except Japan, and she abandoned it after a few months' trial for a system modeled somewhat after the German plan.

Before there can be any adequate and genuine reform of the currency the people of the United States must be made to understand the defects of our currency system. Its imperfections, weaknesses, and the dangers to which it subjects the business of the country, have been pointed out repeatedly by every financier and economist who has discussed the subject in the last ten years, and they ought to be familiar in a general way to every one of us. The way to reform the currency is to correct these imperfections and weaknesses and to set about removing the elements of danger from our system instead of adding a new weakness and a new danger in the shape of another patch on an already overpatched fabric.

In the short time allotted to me I can not, of course, speak of all the weaknesses and defects of our system. I shall only speak of the one that I regard as the most serious, viz, its want of elasticity. No currency is adapted to the wants of a vast industrial country like ours that does not readily and naturally, almost automatically, expand and contract with the varying demands of trade. It is just as important that it should contract at the proper time as that it should expand when there is a legitimate business demand for more currency. We have been having yearly examples of how an inelastic currency works. In the spring of normal years, when the business demand for money is light, rates of interest decline until call loans in New York go down to 1 per cent or less. At the same time the balances carried in New York by all the interior banks begin to mount up. The custom of paying 2 per cent on them adds to the menace of these great balances. The banker paying this rate of 2 per cent and being able to realize only 1 per cent sees some of his July dividends going a glimmering unless he gets a move on. So he listens to the siren voice of the speculator, or perhaps he sends for his broker friends and suggests to them that they find some place where they can put his money out for a time where it will earn a respectable interest. This is the speculator's and promoter's chance, which, of course, they are not slow to take advantage of, and loans are made on speculative stocks, and thus a large percentage of these big balances get into the channels of speculation. In the fall, when the demand begins for money to move the crops, the bankers in New York must call in these loans, which many of the borrowers find it hard to pay and others find it impossible to pay, and there being no way to increase the volume of the currency, a stringency is created both in New York and in the interior. The currency is thus stretched every fall nearly to the breaking point, and if there is a bad failure—for example, like that of the Knickerbocker Trust Company last fall—our patchwork of a currency system breaks down and we have the panic of 1907, or one like it. The business conditions were essentially the same in the fall of 1905 and the fall of 1906 as in 1907, and if the Knickerbocker Trust Company had failed in the fall of 1905 or 1906 instead of 1907 the result would have been the same.

In the spring, when our time of currency redundancy comes, if the amount not needed could be forced absolutely out of circulation, where it would cost nobody anything, and where it would not be a constant temptation to speculation; and if this same redundant currency could in the fall be readily taken from the vaults of the banks, the Comptroller's office, or other redemption agency where it may be stored and put into circulation again to move the crops and meet any extraordinary demand for money, does anybody think that a panic like that of 1907 could come upon us? But there is absolutely no element of elasticity in our currency. Gold is no more elastic than a yard stick. Our stock of this metal can not be increased on short notice nor at all except very gradually, and only in small quantities. The law prevents the increase or decrease of our stock of silver money. The silver and gold certificates have the same characteristics in this respect as the gold coin upon which they are based. In fact, they are silver and gold coin to all intents and purposes, simply put into a more convenient form for use of the public. Our United States notes or greenbacks might have some elasticity, but it has been thought not desirable to give them this quality, and the law, therefore, compels the officers of the Government to immediately reissue them when they are redeemed or reach the Treasury because they are mutilated or worn-out. They are, therefore, just as rigid as the gold and silver coin and the certificates issued thereon.

In our national-bank currency it would seem that we ought to find an element of elasticity, especially as it is in this part of its currency that every other commercial country, except one, finds this quality. In all of them, with a single exception, the bank-note circulation responds quickly and easily to every demand of trade; but, as if we were afraid that our bank-note circulation might develop some symptoms of elasticity, we have this part of our currency tied hard and fast to the national debt. Apparently doubting whether even this horrible, unnatural, unscientific incubus would rob this currency of every particle of elasticity, we have added a provision in the statutes that the banks can retire only a limited quantity each month, it used to be $3,000,000 per month, now it is $9,000,000 per month. Our bank-note currency is, therefore, as rigid as gold coin. I doubt if the repeal of our $9,000,000 per month retirement limit would have much, if any, effect to bring this part of our currency to a more desirable and normal condition while the bond feature is retained. At least the increase of the amount that may be retired monthly from $3,000,000 to $9,000,000 seems to have had no such effect.

While our bank circulation is tied to bonds it is likely that this circulation will continue to act as it usually has acted in the past—expand when the legitimate demands of business require that it should contract and contract when the commercial interests of the country are loudly crying for more currency. Nearly every spring, when there is a surplus of money and interest rates are low, there is an increase in bank circulation; and in the fall, when the annual stringency comes, there is apt to be quite a contraction in the volume of national-bank notes. Last spring when the legitimate interests of the country demanded a contraction of at least $200,000,000 in the circulating medium as a protection against speculation, between March 1 and July 1 there was actually an increase in bank-note circulation of some $18,000,000. These small increases and decreases in circulation are brought about not by any change in the business conditions of the country or the demand or lack of demand of its commercial interests, but are controlled by the price of bonds and the question of whether it is profitable to the banks to take out circulation or to sell their bonds and retire it. This is a most unnatural and dangerous element to have in the currency, and the more speculative in character the bonds the more dangerous it is.

There is a popular and most fallacious public conception that it is the United States bond behind the national-bank note that makes it as good as gold the world over. I want to hit that in passing. Our national-bank notes will be as good as gold anywhere, so long as there is on the part of the Government or the banks the willingness and the ability to redeem them on demand in gold or its equivalent, and not a moment longer; and you can not change this, no matter how many or what kind of bonds you put behind them. The bonds may help protect the Government from loss, but they have no influence in keeping these notes at par.

In 1872 nothing but greenbacks and national-bank notes were in circulation as money east of the Rocky Mountains, while nothing but coin would be received by anybody in California. In that year I made my first trip to California, and when I reached there I was obliged to change my bank notes and greenbacks for gold. The banks charged me a discount of 15 per cent. Everybody in California knew that the bonds behind these notes were good—just as good as they are now—but the trouble was that neither the Government nor the banks had any coin with which to redeem them. The banks would redeem their notes in greenbacks, but these were not real money—only indefinite promises to pay. Hence the 15 per cent discount, which was exactly the same for the bank note as for the greenback, in which currency the bank note was redeemable. And this currency continued to be discounted when exchanged for coin until a short time before the date fixed by the Government for the resumption of specie payments—January 1, 1879. Then, as the day of resumption approached and the coin piled up in the Treasury, we saw this discount on paper currency grow less and less. From 10 per cent it fell to 9, 8, 7, 2 per cent, and finally when the day of resumption came it had disappeared altogether, and from that day to this the national-bank note has remained at par—not because the United States bond behind it was not the same good security prior to 1879 as now, but because the holder of the note could, after January 1, 1879, get the coin for it on demand, while before that date he could not.

In line with this thought, I also beg to remind the committee that the "red-dog," "yellow-dog," and "blue-pup" currency of Illinois in the antebellum days was secured by bonds, and the bonds were generally good, but it could not be kept at par because the banks issuing it did not keep a sufficient coin reserve so that they could always redeem their notes on demand. The bond-secured currency of Wisconsin, on the other hand, was good and circulated at par—not because the bonds behind it were any better, but because the banks did carry a sufficient coin reserve and could and did redeem the notes in coin on demand. As our currency system now is, if there be present the willingness and ability on the part of the Government or the banks to redeem in gold on demand, and the public have no reasonable doubt of this willingness and ability, we can float any paper currency at par. Without these conditions we can not do so, I care not how many nor what kind of bonds we put behind it.

I can not now follow this subject further, but I consider any bond-secured currency as not only inelastic, but unscientific, bungling, unnatural, dangerous, and undesirable from every point of view. We ought to be legislating to change our bond-secured notes into a more desirable form of currency instead of planning to perpetuate them indefinitely and possibly greatly enlarge their volume.

The burning question just now is, How shall we correct the glaring defects in our currency system and prevent, as far as legislation can prevent them, the recurrence of such money panics as we have just passed through? "We should have a central bank of issue," I hear the gentleman from Connecticut and some other learned and experienced men say. "With that established," they tell us, "it would be easy to give elasticity to our currency and sweep away all its other imperfections." Yes; I agree that this would probably be the simplest and easiest way to accomplish what is needed. But, gentlemen, do you not know that the American people have it ingrained in their very bones that Andrew Jackson did a great and glorious and patriotic thing when he destroyed the United States Bank? Just let it be known that we are seriously thinking of establishing in these United States a central bank of issue, with vast capital and with power to issue circulating notes, and at once before nearly every door in the land will stalk the specter of a powerful financial giant, controlling the money and business of the country, dictating its politics, and threatening, if not actually destroying, the liberties of the people. Unfortunately that is what a central bank of issue means to the great mass of the people of the United States. In vain to point to the experience of Germany, France, and other nations. In vain to point out that we have found ways to keep even Departments of the Government out of politics. All, all in vain. A great hereditary fear possesses the average American citizen, and he shuts his ears to the arguments for a central bank. The proverbial snowball has just about as much chance to live in hades as a central bank has to be established at this time in the United States. There is, therefore, little profit in discussing this phase of the question.

Another class are urging that we can not at this time materially change the character of our currency, though I can not for the life of me see why, and that therefore about the only thing that we can do is to provide for an emergency currency for times of future stress or panic by allowing national banks to issue notes upon bonds other than Government bonds and taxing this circulation so high as to drive it in when the stress has passed. A very distinguished gentleman has presented a measure along these lines to the body sitting at the other end of the Capitol, and it is now being considered there. By this measure it is proposed to permit national banks under certain conditions to deposit with the Treasury State, municipal, and railroad bonds, and, with the approval of the Comptroller, to issue bank-note currency against the State and municipal bonds up to 90 per cent and against the railroad bonds up to 75 per cent of their market value. On this currency while it is out, the bank is to pay a tax of one-half of 1 per cent per month, or 6 per cent per annum.

This plan has all of the evils and weaknesses of a bond-secured currency, to which I have referred, and many that our present bond-secured currency has not.

There is also nowhere in this bill any requirement for a gold reserve to be carried by the bank of issue to protect and redeem these notes. While the burden of protecting and keeping them on a parity with gold is thus thrown indirectly entirely on the Treasury, there is no provision for an increase of the gold reserve in the Treasury to enable the Secretary of the Treasury certainly to do this. If issued in any quantity, such a currency would be a new and a great element of danger and render much more insecure the whole body of our paper currency. Besides, no bank would think of taking out any of this circulation except as a last desperate resort. The gentleman from Connecticut figured out a few days ago in his speech on this floor that the circulation would cost any bank issuing it 9½ to 10 per cent, and I think that his figures are substantially correct. Therefore to the public mind the issuance of any of this currency by a bank would be such a flag of distress as to at once invite a run on the bank issuing it. Unless their competitors were issuing it simultaneously, no sane board of bank directors would think of issuing this currency unless their institution was already tottering to its fall. The next logical step would be suspension, and that would be apt to come quickly.

But, eliminating this phase of the subject, I dare assert that every financial panic and flurry that has occurred in this country during my business life started on Wall street. Several of them ended there, but two of them spread over the land, scattering business disaster and suffering everywhere. In the face of this well-known fact shall we, while in the possession of our senses and with our eyes wide open, vote to tie up the currency of the country still closer to Wall street? How many State, municipal, and railroad bonds do you think the national banks of my State of California now own as an investment? Not a dollar's worth. How many by the national banks in the district of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS]? Not one. How many by the national banks in the district of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]? Not one. And what is true of the national banks of these States is true of practically all of the national banks of all the States of the West and South.

The reasons for this are plain. First, these banks are commercial banks, and they do not invest their funds in this kind of security, but in the commercial paper which supplies the needs of their customers. Second, they can not afford to invest in these securities, as the interest rate is always too low. They can do much better with their money. Third, neither the national banks nor the people of the Western and Southern States can afford to have the banks bury their capital in an investment that does the community no direct good. They need all their capital to use at home in developing and carrying forward their industries and business. They have as yet little surplus in the West and South to invest in low-priced bonds.

In view of these facts it is perfectly safe to assume that in the future, as in the past, the national banks in these sections of the country will not invest in these securities, and can not get them when a panic comes unless they buy or borrow them in Wall street.

Under this proposed law, then, how can the banks of the South and West in times of stress help themselves and the country which they serve? They certainly are not likely to pay their good reserve money for these bonds for the privilege of issuing 75 per cent or 90 per cent of the amount they have paid, and this in currency that they can not use for reserve, as, of course, they could not these bond-secured bank notes.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman made some allusion to the report made at the other end of the Capitol in regard to a bill there.

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. In the report was not the statement made that the national banks now held $700,000,000 of bonds that could be used to secure that emergency currency?

Mr. HAYES. I have no doubt the statement was made. I do not recollect the exact figures.

Mr. PARSONS. The figures were taken from one of the appendices furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a request by the Senate. I think the figures used were that August 22 in the 654 banks there were bonds and securities amounting to $700,352,456.58.

Now, following that item, I find that in the State of California there were in San Francisco——

Mr. HAYES. There are ten millions, in round numbers, owned by the banks of California.

Mr. PARSONS. I think it is eighteen millions altogether.

Mr. HAYES. I think it is ten millions, but it does not matter. In San Jose, my town, there are $70,000 of bonds held not as an investment, but to secure Government deposits.

Mr. PARSONS. In the item I was alluding to it is other than the bonds to secure Government deposits.

Mr. HAYES. It may be possible; it may be that the cities of San Francisco and Los Angeles may own some of the bonds, but I think not, and it is not so generally in the State.

Mr. PARSONS. May I call attention to this? I think possibly the gentleman at the other end of the Capitol made a mistake the other day in this way: That item of $700,000,000 bonds in one case is entitled "bond securities," etc.

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. But later, when it is given in greater detail, showing the amount held in each State, it is entitled "securities, judgments, claims, etc." I think people have been misled by thinking that that item really represented the sort of bonds that the bill called for.

Mr. HAYES. As I remember it, the United States bonds and railroad bonds that would be received for circulation under this bill are owned by national banks in California to the extent of $10,000,000. But, as I said, so far as I know and so far as I believe, they are owned exclusively by banks for the purpose of securing United States deposits. I know that the First National Bank of San Jose owns the few that it owns for that purpose, and I know that generally the national banks of the West do not own these low-priced bonds except they buy them for some specific purpose like that I mention.

It has been urged that, even if it were not profitable, if this measure should become a law, the banks ought to provide themselves by purchase of bonds with means to take out the currency when necessary as a matter of safe banking and for the protection of the business of the country. The man that figures that banks are conducting their business for the general good, or will do anything that is not for their financial interest to do, will get badly fooled. As to safety, the national banks of the South and West went through the recent panic all right without any of the securities described in the Aldrich bill, and proved to be as sound or even more sound than some eastern banks that were full of these securities.

It is therefore safe to assume that the national banks of the West and South at least would not buy these bonds, and therefore when a panic came the people of the West and South would be no better off than they would be without this proposed law. Speaking for myself, I will never vote for any measure that can not afford relief direct to the people of California, but will make them even more dependent upon Wall street and the New York banks than now. I want a measure that will enable our California banks to issue their notes or in some way to help themselves and the community they serve promptly, cheaply, and independently of Wall street or the New York banks.

A loan made by a bank upon security, and not upon a mercantile transaction, like mercantile paper, is in the nature of accommodation paper, and the bank must sell the security in order to realize on it. So that when there comes a time of stress, and everybody, the banks in New York and Boston and all the great centers, have made loans upon this kind of security and not upon commercial transactions or commercial paper, they all rush to the market to realize on their securities at once. They are all in the same fix, and the result is that the market goes all to pieces. These securities are either slaughtered or the banks find it impossible to realize, as they found it impossible to realize last fall, and we have a panic. They suspended payment—they failed, as a matter of fact—and the great balances to which I have before referred that were piled up in New York they could not return to the banks that had placed them there on demand, and the result was that the panic spread all over the country.

Our present bond-secured currency was brought into being primarily to make a market for bonds of the United States at a fictitious price. It has done just what its creators thought it would do. Because they are accepted for circulation the United States 2 per cent bonds always are at a premium, selling last December as high as 111. If the Government should change its policy and refuse to accept these bonds for circulation, they would not sell above 80, and probably not above 65 or 70. There is a vague suspicion in the minds of some of us that one of the large motives behind the proposition to allow banks to issue circulation on State, municipal, and railroad bonds is to find a market for these bonds at a fictitious price. This certainly would be the result if any considerable quantity of them were put up for circulation.

Think what it means. The distinguished author of this bill states in his speech in the Senate on this subject that there are four billions of this kind of bonds in the United States. Very well, suppose there are. I think the number is larger than that. But that is his statement. The United States accepts those bonds for circulation. The bill limits the amount to $500,000,000. Suppose that half that amount, $250,000,000, are taken and sold to the banks or loaned to them, and they take out their circulation upon them. Does anybody suppose that the price of those bonds will not rise in the market? Every one that Uncle Sam puts his O. K. on when he says it is a good bond by accepting it for circulation, will go up, say five points, in the market. It will be nearer ten or twenty points, just like United States bonds. They go up 20 or 40 per cent. They always have been higher than they ought to be, since the first refunding plan of the Treasury, for the reason I have already stated. Now, suppose they go up five points. That means adding to the wealth of the holders of those bonds $200,000,000. Suppose they go up ten points. That means adding $400,000,000 to the men who own those bonds. Who do you suppose own them? Not servant girls, not farmers, not the business men of the country. The most of them are owned right over there in Wall street. John D. Rockefeller is probably the largest owner of bonds in the United States. He owns millions, and probably hundreds of millions, of those bonds. I know of one case where he went into the market and took the whole of the issue of one railroad company, amounting to more than $30,000,000.

Now, suppose that he owns five hundred millions of these bonds, an increase of 10 per cent means adding to his fortune $50,000,000. Gentlemen, this scheme is very much easier than to raise the price of oil. It will produce money vastly faster and quicker. And the same is true of smaller holders of these bonds.

I admit that it would be a great thing for the speculator on Wall street, especially in times of stress, when ready cash is so valuable, to have created by law a good market for his bonds, or to have the right to force the Government to carry them for him on a 10 per cent margin or a 25 per cent margin, as the case may be, by paying the Government 6 per cent for doing it. That is about all that this proposed bill amounts to. I do not think, however, that the Government would be justified in thus making the nefarious practices of the gambler in stocks and bonds any safer than at present, especially when the currency, which is made the excuse for this legislative scheme, can be got much more cheaply, quickly, easily, and safely by other methods. In making these statements I want to distinctly disclaim any intention of reflecting upon the honesty or patriotism of any Member of either House of Congress.

Let us suppose that the bill now before the Senate is the law and that I am mistaken in my assertion that no sound bank would dare use the circulation except as a last resort. What would prevent any Wall street bank or set of men controlling such a bank going into the market and buying State or municipal bonds on a 10 per cent margin, turning the bonds over to the Government and taking out circulation enough to pay the balance of the purchase price by paying the Government 6 per cent per annum for this great and valuable privilege? Or what would prevent a stock gambler who was carrying such bonds on a 10 per cent margin turning his onerous burden over to the Government in the way that I have indicated when a time of stress overtakes him and forcing Uncle Sam to carry it for him until the stress is over? Or take another illustration. Let us suppose that this proposed new currency law is in force and there has been enough of a flurry in Wall street to make a good excuse for the banks to call upon the Treasury for permission to take out this circulation. Prices of all kinds of securities would, of course, as a result of this flurry, become much demoralized. A man or set of men in control of a big Wall street bank see a block of $5,000,000 of gilt-edged railroad bonds which for some reason are offered for cash much below their value, say $4,000,000. They put up 25 per cent in cash, or $1,000,000, get the bank to take the bonds thus bought to Washington and take out enough circulation upon them to pay the balance of the purchase price, $3,000,000, which under the law they could do. In a few weeks the flurry is over, the bonds naturally go up in the market to their normal price, or, because Uncle Sam has put his O. K. upon them for circulation, they would undoubtedly go higher than their normal price. Say that in a month they go to par. The speculators cause their bank to retire the circulation, sell their bonds, and pocket their profit of $1,000,000 on an investment of $1,000,000 for thirty days. This beats the ordinary speculation on margins out of sight, and, so far as the currency is concerned, it has been expanded to the extent of $3,000,000 and in thirty days contracted the same amount, primarily because of the needs of the speculator and not in response to the demands of legitimate trade.

Let us take another example. We will suppose some gentleman in New York, say John D. Rockefeller, has fifty millions of bonds of the Pennsylvania Railroad. He thinks he sees a great chance to make some money. These bonds are depressed in price and he wants to boost them and unload them on the public. He goes to the bank and says, "Here, take $5,000,000 of these bonds over to Washington and take out circulation on them; I will not charge you any interest." The banker takes them over to Washington and the Secretary of the Treasury or the Comptroller takes them, and as a result of Uncle Sam putting his O. K. on them the bonds go up five or ten points. Mr. Rockefeller unloads his bonds and realizes his two and a half to five millions of dollars as a result of the transaction, takes down the bonds from the Treasury, retires the circulation, and the country has had the expansion of that much currency and its contraction again in that short time in order to further this scheme of the bond speculator.

Mr. SMITH of California. If I understand the provisions of the Senate bill, it specifies certain classes of railroad securities that may be used.

Mr. HAYES. Yes; only the best.

Mr. SMITH of California. It seems to me the argument the gentleman has just made is fallacious in this, that he assumes that a given railroad security would not have the benefit of that act until this came to Washington and was accepted, whereas, as I understand it, the minute the bill is passed all of the railroad securities that fall within the definition of the bill will have the benefit of whatever impulse that gives, and therefore there would not be speculation growing out of bringing them to Washington and depositing them for currency, which the gentleman suggests. They would get the impetus from the bill and not from the operation of the bill.

Mr. HAYES. My colleague is mistaken. No particular bonds are specified. They are only defined in the bill in a general way. It is left to the officers of the Treasury to determine whether a particular bond comes within the class fixed by the law. Even if my colleague were correct, the only effect that I have suggested then would come by the passage of the law according to my colleague's idea. That would be the swelling of the property of the people who hold the bonds. But it has not had that effect in bonds of the United States used to secure circulation. They are speculated in just the same. So that even taking out of consideration the one element to which the gentleman refers, there would remain still the other element—the law of supply and demand. You take a few hundred millions of dollars of these bonds away from the investor who has been in the habit of putting his money into them, and in order to get them he will offer a higher price, and the price will go up as I stated.

Mr. SMITH of California. On that point, allow me to make this suggestion. It was stated by the author of the bill that there were about four billions——

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of California. Which would be eight to one of the possible circulation, and the gentleman stated a few moments ago, I think, that he thought it was possibly twice or two and a half times as much as that.

Mr. HAYES. No; I did not say so, but I think it is larger than that.

Mr. SMITH of California. Even say four billion. No one supposes that the total of the circulation of five hundred millions is going to be called for very often, and the gentleman's suggestion was that it might possibly reach the half of that. Therefore there would be available securities, sixteen to one of the probable demand for circulation, and that demand for circulation would not arise all at once. Therefore there would not be buyers on the market on a sudden calling for $250,000,000 of these securities out of this four billion and I only wanted to suggest, if the gentleman will pardon the interruption, that I think he draws too long a bow on the effect this legislation will have on the value of these securities, there being such a large mass of them available for such a simple purpose.

Mr. HAYES. I think not.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Allow me to state, if the gentleman will pardon me, perhaps for general information, that one of the large bond dealers of the United States told me the other day, after a careful examination of that bill, that in his judgment, out of the four billion of bonds which were specified as available, probably not more than 10 per cent of that amount would come within the strict compliance of the law, and that, in his judgment, the effect upon that 10 per cent would put them to the 2 per cent basis of a Government bond, about 130 or 140.

Mr. HAYES. My own impression, in reply to the suggestion of my colleague, as I have already inferred, is that not one dollar of this currency will ever be taken out, except by the banks controlled by speculative interests. The strictly commercial national banks will not take it out unless it becomes a matter of imperative necessity, not of one bank, but of all the banks of the country or of one section, and when currency is needed the most that it ever is, and is the most available to the speculator, he will have a means provided whereby he can realize on his securities in the quickest and easiest possible way, and, as I stated, in my humble opinion, that is the main purpose of this proposition—to give him that privilege.

Mr. SMITH of California. Do I understand you to say y(think the bill would not be operative?

Mr. HAYES. I do not think it would be generally.

Mr. SMITH of California. And that they would not——

Mr. HAYES. Except in times of great stress. Except the bank was in great need of currency, no bank would think of taking out that currency; not unless the roof of the house was burning would they ever think of calling for such relief.

Mr. SMITH of California. I am one of the kindergartners you are supposed to be talking to, and I am asking my teacher a few questions. I understand you think the bill would not be operative because we have not the same general plan under which a Government bond is operative.

Mr. HAYES. There is now no tax on circulation, except one-half of 1 per cent. Under the 6 per cent tax the gentleman from Connecticut figured out the other day the cost to the bank would be 9½ or 10 per cent, and possibly more than that, and I say that no bank could afford to throw such a flag of distress to the public and tell them that they were paying 10 per cent for currency.

Mr. SMITH of California. If the rate of interest on emergency currency was reduced, would that occur?

Mr. HAYES. That would help.

Mr. SMITH of California. I wish you would make a little plainer to your primary class here what you mean by a flag of distress which would float over the banks if they desired to put out this kind of new money.

Mr. HAYES. When there is an issue of clearing-house certificates, for instance, everybody knows it is a notice that they have not the money to pay drafts or checks. Everybody knows that, and when the banks put out the notes provided for in this bill everybody who knows anything about currency would know that the bank was taking out this circulation because it was out of cash and for that reason they were obliged to do it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? What the gentleman says reminds me of a dialogue I had not two hours ago with a banker of my own State. I raised that exact point. I said: "How can you keep the issue of this particular circulation secret; and if you do not keep it secret, if it is known as emergency circulation, why will not a panic begin?"

Mr. HAYES. That is it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He said: "It can be and will be kept secret, as it is in Germany——

Mr. HAYES. It can not be, because it has to be in different language—that is the provision of the bill—and hence a different appearance.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I asked him how they kept it secret in Germany, and he told me——

Mr. HAYES. It would be a different currency.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He told me in Germany this emergency circulation was issued, and it was issued——

Mr. HAYES. I am going to speak of that in a moment. In this country unless the law is amended no such thing would be possible. Everybody who looked at it would know what it was, just as they know clearing-house certificates when they are issued.

Mr. SMITH of California. Did you ever know anybody in practical, everyday business operations to read the superscription on a piece of paper mony?

Mr. HAYES. I have read them many times.

Mr. SMITH of California. I have as a matter of curiosity, but I venture to say, with the presumably large amount of money that you have in your pocket now, you have not read the superscription of one piece out of a thousand.

Mr. HAYES. If there was a time of stress——

Mr. SMITH of California. Not in time of stress, but in the ordinary transactions.

Mr. HAYES. You can make——

Mr. SMITH of California. I do not look at——

Mr. HAYES. I can not yield to the gentleman for a speech, I yield for a question, not for a speech. Everybody would look at a new bank note coming out, as it has a little different verbiage, it has a little different appearance, and everybody will notice it practically; not one, but everybody, just as they would clearing-house certificates. Now, that is one great weakness in this legislation.

Mr. BRUMM. Is it not a fact the attention of the public would be called to the fact there is an emergency currency being issued from the very knowledge of the existence of the stuff, and that there was a panic?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. And that would call the attention of everybody to this new money.

Mr. HAYES. And everybody would be watching to see what money he got.

Mr. SMITH of California. Just one suggestion. I do not want to consume the gentleman's time, but we are now considering the needs of the banks in the autumn when the crops are to be moved. Now, that is not a condition of distress, but an ordinary business necessity, and very few people in the community would know that the bank had brought about this additional circulation, and they would not care.

Mr. HAYES. They would know it.

Mr. SMITH of California. If it is printed in substantially the color, I am of the opinion nobody would pay any attention to it.

Mr. HAYES. I have been in the banking business in my earlier life, and I have found that even little things that take place in the bank find their way out and begin to pass around the community as rumors, and everybody comes to know the condition of every bank in the community by just what leaks out of its business. Do you think if a bank was taking out circulation that cost them 10 per cent that nobody would know it? The depositors would be the very first ones to find it out and act upon it.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman spoke about the effect this bill would have upon municipal and railroad bonds, and yet he says that the act would not be availed of.

Mr. HAYES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Let me suggest to him what I have said. I have said, supposing all this was out of it. I prefaced my remarks in that regard by saying, supposing I was mistaken about this. My conviction is that there would not any of it be used, except possibly by banks controlled by speculative interests, unless a panic was actually in progress.

Mr. PARSONS. Then, if that is so, how would this cause an appreciation in the value of these bonds?

Mr. HAYES. I do not think it would. My colleague from California [Mr. SMITH] thinks it would, but I do not think it would until they were accepted by the Treasury.

These illustrations are by no means chimerical or impossible. On the contrary, it is certain that not only these but other possibilities of using the Treasury of the United States to further their schemes, if this bill becomes a law, will be discovered by these stock gamblers. The bill certainly has great possibilities for them and should be entitled, "A bill for the benefit of Wall street."

The distinguished author of this bill claims that the plan proposed by him is "substantially the plan of the Imperial Bank of Germany." On the contrary, the currency which he proposes has not a single point in common with the German emergency currency, except the high tax. The Germany currency is protected by a gold reserve of 33⅓ per cent. The currency proposed by him has not a dollar of reserve behind it anywhere. The German notes are also protected by gilt-edged commercial paper, the most liquid assets in the world. The currency proposed by this bill has bonds behind it, some of them having a very limited market, and in times of stress no market at all. The German currency is in the shape of the ordinary notes of the Imperial Bank, to which the people are accustomed, and no one knows when they are issued except the Government and the officers of the bank. The public are therefore not alarmed by the appearance of the notes. On the other hand, the emergency notes provided by this bill would be notice to every person who saw them that a great emergency had arisen to call them out, and the public would thus be alarmed and the very crisis accentuated that they are supposed to cure. Therefore the proposition can not be bolstered up by comparing it with the successful German system, since they have no important points in common.

I think, therefore, that this measure, instead of preventing panics or mitigating their severity, would have a tendency to bring them on and continue them when they had once come upon us. Unless it is violently amended, I could not defend a vote for this vicious, dangerous, and, as I believe, wholly ineffectual currency measure, before my constituents, composed of laborers, farmers, and business men. Neither can you, my brother Members, especially you who come from the West and South.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman pardon me for another interruption? I want to understand this question, and the questions I am propounding are asked with the utmost good faith.

Mr. HAYES. No doubt.

Mr. SMITH of California. A national bank organizes, and is authorized to issue money. It may not do it. Now, if it does issue some money, as we call it, that does not alarm the community.

Mr. HAYES. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of California. Then why should it alarm the community if a bank operating under this provision, which, it seems to me, is exactly like the national-bank issue——

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman is not a banker, but I can explain in just a few words why it would raise an alarm. Suppose I was conducting a bank in San Jose. There are six banks in the town, and my bank gets into difficulties and wants cash, and I take some of my gilt-edged paper to be discounted and pay a discount of 12 per cent. Does the gentleman think that would not create an alarm in the community?

Mr. SMITH of California. I do not think the customers of the bank would know.

Mr. HAYES. It would get out in twenty-four hours, and depositors would begin to come to the bank and demand their money.

Mr. SMITH of California. Suppose you were not distressed?

Mr. HAYES. I would have to be in distress if I did anything like that.

Mr. SMITH of California. Suppose that a gentleman comes to your bank in the fall and says, "I want to move the prune crop from the Santa Clara Valley." You say, "I have not exactly the amount of money on hand that will meet your needs, but I can go to the Government with the securities I have and secure from the Government that which takes the place of money, and I will do so if you have got the satisfactory security which you have from year to year." That is not an evidence of distress in any bank.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman must understand that that sort of explanation would immediately arouse a suspicion in the mind of the man to whom it was made. A bank can never stop to explain questionable transactions to its customers unless it wants to reap a harvest of suspicion.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does the gentleman assume that the farmers in his district are going to move the prune crop on 10 per cent money?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. Then you would be hard up.

Mr. SMITH of California. I want to ask another question, and then I am going to allow the gentleman to proceed. I am very much interested in what he says. Instead of doing as I suggested, that he go to the United States and get the money with which to help this man move his prune crop, and in that way, as the gentleman says, alarm the community, suppose he went to San Francisco or Los Angeles, where the fruit crop is not being moved at that particular time, and got the money. Would that alarm the community?

Mr. HAYES. Not at all. There is a vast difference in that. One is notice to the community that he is much in need of money, and he can not get any in Los Angeles and San Francisco, whereas the other is a very natural and ordinary transaction. If the notes were being used and there was not the high taxation on the circulation that the Aldrich bill provides then, of course, that particular objection falls to the ground.

Mr. SMITH of California. If that is the only red flag that is in this bill, that can be remedied.

Mr. HAYES. I say that is not the only objection, but I say, that so far as alarm is concerned, that is the red flag.

Mr. BRUMM. Is it not true that the banker issuing money or issuing notes upon which he can make money will give no alarm, but when he begins to issue notes upon which he loses money, that in itself creates alarm?

Mr. HAYES. That is right.

Mr. BRUMM. And is an answer to the argument of the gentleman, your colleague.

Mr. SMITH of California. That is not a very strong argument against the bill.

Mr. HAYES. Since I have prepared this speech I have received circulars from commercial associations of several of the great cities, like the city of Philadelphia. In a circular issued by the Trades League of that city I find this statement, which I am glad to read because it expresses and enforces the objections I have made:

> Under this bill it is evident that only a limited number of banks would find it convenient to offer the required security, for comparatively few banks at this time own either State, municipal, or railroad bonds. Therefore, as there would be no profit for banks to pay out currency to purchase such bonds (on which but 75 or 90 per cent of currency would be issued), it is self-evident that additional currency could be issued only to the comparatively few banks which owned such bonds, or to those who were willing to pay a premium for borrowing them for this purpose. And inasmuch as the rate of interest to the banks would be 6 per cent, it is also evident that applications for such currency would be made only after an extreme money stringency or panic had developed and borrowers were forced, in desperation, to submit to a rate of interest which would violate the law of usury in many States.
> NO BENEFIT TO COUNTRY AT LARGE.
> In our opinion the Aldrich bill would be of no substantial benefit to the manufacturing, commercial, or agricultural interests of this country, although it might to some extent save favored financial interests from the maximum penalties of a currency panic and, incidentally, would also impart a fictitious value to the bonds specified, and we therefore oppose its passage.

I have also here a resolution of the Merchants' Association of New York, which is the greatest body of strictly commercial business men in the world, a part of which is as follows:

> Resolved, That this committee on bankruptcy and commercial law disapproves Senate bill No. 3023, entitled "A bill to amend the national banking laws," introduced by Senator ALDRICH, for the following reasons:
> 1. They regard as essentially unsound the principle embodied therein, that a currency should be based upon fixed securities of any description. The note issues as well as the deposits of a bank are obligations payable on demand, and the bank should hold as security against such liabilities nothing but quick assets, such as actual cash, secured notes payable on demand, or commercial paper liquidating itself at par at the end of a short period of months. It is no safe function for a bank of deposit or issue to invest assets held against demand obligations in long-term notes, bonds, or mortgages the conversion of which into cash in times of stringency can only be accomplished at sacrifice of the principal, if at all. The policy which might reasonably create an artificial market for the national obligations in time of civil war can not excuse an extension of the same favor to State or municipal bonds and railroad mortgages in time of peace.
> 2. The high tax which this bill proposes to levy upon the issue of emergency currency, and which in the last analysis would be paid by the borrower to the banks, when increased, as it would be, in practice at least, one-third by reserve requirements, is not only unnecessary, but oppressive; and in this and other States would provoke an immediate disregard of the statutes against usury. It is not becoming that a great nation should fill its coffers from the necessities of borrowers, and it is manifestly improper to pass one law which offers inducements to the violation of another.
> It is the unanimous opinion of your committee, as evidenced by the signatures hereto, that rather than accept legislation of the character of the Aldrich bill, which we feel in its ultimate results would be most disastrous to the commercial interests of the country, it would be preferable to have no legislation at all, in spite of the manifest necessity of some relief to the present intolerable situation.

What, then, can we do to protect the good people of the United States from future money panics, or to lessen their severity if we can not wholly prevent them? It seems to me that one phase of our recent experience will lead us to the right answer to this question.

During the recent financial panic the various clearing-house associations of the United States, composed of the banks of each clearing-house district, issued somewhere from $190,000,000 to $250,000,000 in clearing-house certificates, upon which clearing-house checks were issued. These checks were issued entirely outside the law. They could not be immediately redeemed in gold coin or any other currency, and yet because the people knew that they were good, as they were, and needed them in the transaction of their business, these clearing-house checks generally circulated at par, and with them the banks enabled business to proceed and the laborers and employees to be paid, when without them the business of the country must have come to a complete standstill. These clearing-house certificates were the purest kind of credit currency, founded upon nothing but the assets and credit of the banks that belonged to the clearing-house associations. I believe that each bank that took out the circulation from the clearing house had to put up commercial paper or other security with the clearing house that was satisfactory to it as a condition precedent to issuing checks upon these clearing-house certificates.

I submit that our experiences with these clearing-house certificates and checks, if they do not point the way to genuine currency reform, certainly indicate the character of emergency currency that we should provide if at this time we are to legislate only for an emergency currency. These clearing-house checks were only adapted to circulate in the immediate neighborhood in which they were issued, since they had no legal-tender quality nor any law that would strengthen them outside the community that knew of the financial standing and character of the particular banks that issued them. They were also of an entirely different character and appearance from any currency to which the people were accustomed. They had no guaranty of the Government and no indemnity fund to which the note holder could resort in case the banks failed to redeem the notes, and yet, as before stated, in spite of these drawbacks these certificates made a very satisfactory currency during the time when the national-bank currency and the gold and silver coin and certificates were being hoarded and kept from the banks.

Mr. VREELAND. I would ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that all these clearing-house certificates were secured?

Mr. HAYES. They were secured by the assets of the bank—by commercial paper which every commercial bank carries.

Mr. PARSONS. Did not the local clearing houses charge interest on it?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly they charged interest upon it.

If it is only an emergency currency that is at this time demanded, I submit that the Congress of the United States, by legalizing and properly regulating the emission of certificates and checks by the clearing houses of the various commercial centers of the United States, could give to the people a very much more satisfactory, much cheaper currency than that proposed by the Aldrich bill and one that could be issued very much more expeditiously.

But I conceive that the Congress of the United States in providing an emergency currency might well go further and embody the principles underlying the clearing-house certificates and checks in a measure that would give to the country an asset currency with many additional safeguards and securities, which would be very much more satisfactory to the people than clearing-house certificates and checks, because they would feel that it was safer. For example, suppose that we divide the country into twenty or thirty commercial zones or districts, as proposed in the bill that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] has introduced, making a large city the center of each one of these zones, and require all national banks to attach themselves to one of these centers—join the clearing-house association, as it were—and then provide that they may issue their bills, with the consent of the Comptroller of the Currency, up to, say, 37½ per cent of their capital stock—although I think that 50 per cent would be better—under a graduated tax, which would have the effect of preventing this currency coming into existence unless the business interests of the country demanded it and would assist, possibly, in driving it out of circulation when the immediate need for it had passed. Each one of these centers in each one of these twenty or thirty zones should be a redemption center, to which the notes of all the banks in that district could be sent and immediately redeemed on demand in gold coin or lawful money, as well as over the counter of the bank that issued them.

To refer to the clearing-house checks again. These checks were retired from circulation as soon as the need for them was passed, although they were not taxed at all. They began to be issued only about four months ago, yet, having served their purpose, in most cities I believe they have entirely disappeared from circulation. There is no reason to suppose that the currency that I have suggested, under the sanction of the United States and with such guaranties as to make it acceptable all over the country, would not also naturally retire from the channels of trade as soon as the necessity for it had passed.

In addition to this consideration, if this circulation were guaranteed by a fund in the hands of the Comptroller of the Currency, which should be made up by compelling all the national banks of the United States before they were allowed to take out the circulation to put up 5 per cent of the amount that they take out and keep that 5 per cent good with the Comptroller, letting the taxes that may be collected on the circulation go to swell this fund, it would be absolutely certain that every note holder could receive the coin or lawful money of the United States for his note whenever it should be presented.

It will be recalled that during the forty-four years that the national-bank act has been in operation the total losses to depositors on account of failed banks amount to less than $35,000,000; and if the notes issued by these banks are made a first lien on their assets it is probable that not one dollar of the notes would ever fail to be ultimately redeemed, even without a guaranty fund. The principal purpose of the guaranty fund is to provide for the payment on demand of the notes of any banks that fail, and to give the public confidence in the soundness of the notes. Then let these notes be issued in appearance, form, and verbiage similar to the present national-bank note; only change the words "This note is secured by bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States" into "This note is secured by a guaranty fund deposited with the Treasurer of the United States." Who doubts that such a note as this would be acceptable to the people of the United States? Who doubts for a moment that it would be absolutely good—just as good as any bond-secured note that was ever issued? To some of its advantages over those offered by the currency of the proposed Aldrich bill I will briefly call your attention.

First. Neither its issuance nor the volume of it would depend in any degree upon the possession or the price of bonds. It would not be affected by the fluctuations in the market of any kind of securities, but would respond easily, quickly, and naturally to any unusual or excessive demand of legitimate trade for more currency.

Second. The banks of California and of all the States of the West and South, as well as of other sections of the country, could issue this currency whenever such conditions arose as to make it desirable, without going to Wall street or any other place to buy bonds, which, as I have shown earlier in my remarks, have no influence in keeping the currency at par, but are only valuable to protect the United States Government from loss. Under this arrangement, if the national banks were allowed to issue 37½ per cent of their capital in this kind of currency the national banks of the State of California now organized would be able to issue over $11,000,000. Under the Aldrich plan they would not issue one dollar. The banks of the State of North Dakota would be able to issue $1,650,000, where under the Aldrich plan they would not issue one dollar. The banks of the State of Texas would be able to issue, in round numbers, $15,000,000, whereas under the Aldrich plan they would not issue one dollar. And so similarly in all the States removed from Wall street and the great commercial centers. They could all come very near supplying the demands of their customers, and thus not only save the business of the country in times of panic, but, when times of stress and uncertainty are approaching, by the issuance of this currency they might effectually relieve the money stress and usually prevent a serious panic like that of November last.

Third. The assets of a properly managed commercial bank are the most liquid and the safest assets in the world. They are based upon the things that the people eat and wear and use, and the people must eat and live even in a panic; so the paper of a commercial bank will in a short time be met, no matter what the financial condition of the country may be. My experience in 1893 and 1894 proved to me that bankable commercial paper could be realized upon when bonds of all kinds were a drug in the market—indeed, when they could not be sold at any price. Bonds are a kind of investment luxury, and investors in them are comparatively few. No investor has to have them, but everybody must have food and clothes.

In view of our own experience with a pure credit currency, the clearing-house certificates and checks of the recent panic; in view of the experience of the Empire of Germany for the last thirty-eight years, of the Bank of France for one hundred years, of the banks of Canada for many years past, and of every commercial country in the entire world outside our own country and England proper, if we are not ready to vote to change our system at this time and put the currency at once on the right basis, why should we hesitate to provide for at least a limited amount of this currency? In all these countries their paper currency is a pure credit currency, based upon the principles that I have suggested. It is the currency of the civilized world. There should be behind this currency in every bank that issues it a good, safe reserve in lawful money, and there should be a requirement that every bank that issued it should make arrangements with its redemption agency in the commercial zone to which it belongs for the prompt redemption of these notes when they are presented at such agency for redemption. In this way they would not become a menace in the circulating medium of the country, but on the other hand would greatly strengthen our bank position and relieve the Government of the United States from the burden of redeeming or maintaining them at a parity with gold.

One of the greatest objections that I have to the Aldrich bill is that it provides no reserve, nothing anywhere, in the banks or in the Treasury of the United States, for the redemption of notes for the issuance of which it provides, and therefore leaves them, should they be issued in any quantity, as an additional burden upon the Treasury of the United States at the very time when the Treasury should be strengthened, for in such a time the Treasury is always in danger of having its gold reserve depleted by the calls that the frightened and distracted people may make upon it by presenting their notes for redemption when no additional supply of gold is provided to meet this possible emergency.

Not only the $346,000,000 of greenbacks or United States notes are resting upon the Treasury gold reserve, but at least $300,000,000 of the silver dollars and silver certificates, and indirectly the $700,000,000 of the present bond-secured notes. Three years ago I made a trip to Mexico. I knew that each one of my twenty-dollar gold pieces would there buy more than forty Mexican dollars, but I was surprised to find that as soon as I crossed the river into Mexico I could readily exchange each one of my American silver dollars anywhere for two Mexican dollars, although the Mexican dollar had more silver, and hence more intrinsic value, than my dollar. This was, of course, because the Government of the United States was ready and able to redeem its silver dollars in gold. So one-half the value of our silver money, or $300,000,000, $346,000,000 greenbacks, and $700,000,000 of national-bank notes, or $1,350,000,000 of our currency, rests on the $150,000,000 gold reserve in the Treasury, and this is what safely keeps it all at par. In other words, Uncle Sam carries a gold reserve of 11 per cent against our nongold currency, leaving out of account the fractional silver.

The national-bank circulation has been increased in the last five or six years nearly $300,000,000, $140,000,000 since October last. We should therefore probably now be thinking about increasing the Treasury gold reserve by $50,000,000, instead of planning to add to the paper currency a possible $500,000,000 without any additional gold reserve either in the Treasury or in the banks.

The plan that I have suggested is only for an emergency currency, and in its main points, with some additions, is the same as that suggested by the currency commission of the American Bankers' Association. Although I regard this plan as very much superior to that of the Aldrich bill, personally I think that we ought to go very much further and put our currency at this time on a thoroughly sound and correct basis.

It may be urged that this plan can be assailed as a bankers' measure, but I would much prefer to make a bankers' measure, if you please, so that the national banks in California and Texas, in Missouri and in North Dakota, and in every other place in the land could issue currency at any time when they and the Comptroller agreed that there was a necessity for it to meet the needs of their customers and the pressing necessities of the business men, laborers, and farmers of the community in which they are located than to make a currency for the relief of the men who are the owners of the speculative municipal and railroad bonds of the country. Bring this relief home to the people who need it. Permit their home banks to help them to finance their farms, their factories, their business, to market their produce—the produce of the soil, of the loom, and of the factory—instead of tying the business and the brawn of the country up to the speculator in bonds on Wall street and forcing the people to pay tribute to those who fatten off the misfortunes of their country when there comes a time of stress.

I ask leave to append to my remarks a set of figures prepared by Mr. John L. Hamilton, a member of the currency commission of the American Bankers' Association, showing the amount of currency that could be issued by the various banks of the various States and sections of the country under the law proposed by that commission, which allows the banks to issue up to 37½ per cent of their capital. This bill is House bill No. 15262, introduced by Mr. McKINNEY of Illinois.

The Committee on Banking and Currency of the House have under consideration, and I hope will presently report to the House, a bill which I trust will include the principles that I have just advocated, with such additions, amendments, modifications, and safeguards as in their wisdom they think the situation demands. [Loud applause.]

With the consent of the House, I append the following tables:

The following is the amount of credit notes that could be issued in each of the following States under the law proposed by the currency commission of the American Bankers' Association:

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield the time yielded to me by the gentleman from Virginia to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN].

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to see so many vacant seats, but a man who has done as much campaigning as I have can make use of existing conditions. [Laughter.] I have always spoken though there were but a dozen persons before me. I always presumed that that dozen would go out in the world and tell the people what I told them. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, I wish to say that after the gentleman from Tennessee spoke—and he made a most excellent speech—I saw a number of people on that side leave the House. Could it be possible that those gentlemen were afraid that his arguments might be successfully answered, as I believe they can? I will not take the time now to offset his argument; but I will say, in brief, that a paper received from my home State makes this statement, under the heading of a great snowstorm in the leading city of my State: "It was utterly impossible to find men to shovel the streets, while they were offered $2 a day." From another place, not far from my home city, where they have large paper industries, the question is not who is out of work—for they have already increased the pay for common labor from $1.50 to $1.70—but how to get enough men to do the work.

However, I did not rise to-day to speak on political affairs. I wish to refer to a matter alluded to this afternoon by the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], the Army canteen.

My introduction of a bill to re-establish the canteen in the Army—that is, to allow the sale of light wines and beer to the soldiers in the various posts and veterans' homes, has brought down on me the wrath of temperance and prohibition people, not alone in my district but in many parts of the country.

The ladies especially, whom I so much adore, have attacked me most severely, but I forgive them for I feel that they have not given the matter the thorough study necessary to speak intelligently, and that they were misled by sentimentality and not by facts and figures.

Some of these women have intimated that I, being of German parentage, would naturally stand on the side of the liquor interests, and that I would rather see the good soldier ruin his health and morals than to have those interests interfered with.

Poor, misguided people, blinded by their zeal to have all intoxicating liquor driven out of this country. They actually believe that they will accomplish this Herculean task.

Now, to set matters right, let me say at the outset that, in spite of my German name, which my good parents gave me, there is no one on this floor or in this country who is more thoroughly in favor of temperate habits than I am, for I favor temperance in drinking, temperance in eating, and in everything else.

No, I am not a champion of the liquor interests, and if I had the power I would take away the license from every saloon keeper who does not run an orderly place and who will give intoxicating liquor to anyone already under its influence, or to anyone whom he knows it will have an ill effect upon.

On the other hand I want to see those dealers in spirituous liquors protected, and not classed among the outcasts, who maintain good order in their places, and serve those who find comfort in taking a glass of beer or wine, chatting with friends while drinking it and knowing when to quit.

Right here let me say that if the prohibitionists who are now trying to do something that in the long run they will find impossible to do, viz, to entirely stop the liquor traffic, would devote their energies toward stopping treating, they would do much more toward real temperance than they will ever perform with their present methods.

People who would never sign a pledge to quit drinking intoxicating liquor might be easily induced not to treat or accept a treat.

If this was done, people would get used to the custom as it prevails in Germany and other European countries, where everyone pays for what he eats or drinks, and the number of saloons would materially lessen, and cases of intoxication would become few and far between.

In my State, Wisconsin, antitreating societies exist in many cities, and on entering a saloon a number of men can often be seen grouped around a table talking over business affairs, criticising the work of Congress, getting much comfort and satisfaction out of the short time spent there, and at the end of the session everyone pays his own bill, be it for a cup of coffee, a glass of beer or wine, or some other beverage.

You will be astonished to see how little they drink and how much they talk.

It would be cruel to break up these social gatherings, simply because there are some people who, rather than refuse the offer of a treating friend, or feeling under obligations to treat when their turn comes, imbibe more than is good for them.

Anything done to excess will bring evil consequences, whether it is to drink intoxicating liquor, ice water, ginger ale, or to eat watermelons and lobsters.

Prohibition will make people the more desirous to partake of the forbidden fruit, but proper regulation and insisting upon strict obedience to these regulations will bring the desired results at an earlier date.

I am told that in the Netherlands the saloons are not licensed, but only the customers, who can not procure any liquor without first showing their license.

Of course, no one who overindulges can secure the license.

These few hints thrown out to the temperance workers may prove of some benefit to them in their endeavor to make the world and its inhabitants better.

We Representatives have been sent here by our constituents, not to be led by sentimentality or the pleadings of extremists, but in every case to weigh all the facts brought before us and to decide according to our best judgment.

Now, what are the true facts regarding the Army canteen?

After the canteen had been in existence for many years, during which the drinking of light wines and beer had brought no evil results, the imbibing to excess being made impossible save in rare cases by the presence of the superior officers, a majority of the House and Senate, through misrepresentations and the influence of women, who meant well, but gave the matter but superficial consideration, decided to abolish the canteen.

Many were persuaded to support the bill, and help to abolish the canteen simply to see what results it would bring—whether beneficial or detrimental.

The bill was passed on February 2, 1901, and the operation of it has been given a fair trial—a seven-year trial.

The Members of Congress are not in position to say whether the seven years' test has proven it to be a wise measure, nor do the women, who were so zealous in furthering the proposition merely for sentimental reasons, actually know whether it has stood the test—whether it accomplished what was expected of it—but the officers of the Army, the men who manage our military affairs, are no longer in doubt as to the results of that act.

The Secretary of War, Hon. W. H. Taft, after a trial period of only two years, or thereabouts, says in his report:

> I am convinced that the general effect of prohibiting the use of beer and light wines within the limited area of the Army post is to lead the enlisted men to go out of the post, to frequent vile resorts which cluster in the neighborhood, to drink bad whisky to excess, and to associate intimately with abandoned men and still more abandoned women, and that the operation of the law is to increase drunkenness, disease of the most loathsome kind, insubordination and desertion, and moral and physical degeneration.

That the Secretary of War has not changed his mind in the least is evident from his latest report, which reads as follows:

> Venereal diseases were again the most important diseases affecting the efficiency of the Army during the year. There were constantly on sick report for this class of affections 739 men, equal to the loss for the entire year of the service of about 11 full companies of infantry.

The Adjutant-General of the Army, Maj. Gen. F. C. Ainsworth, reports as follows:

The restoration of the exchange as it existed prior to the passage of the act of February 2, 1901, prohibiting the sale of beer and light wines is desired by the great majority of officers and men, and by none more than those of pronounced temperance views. Numerous reports confirm the views long held by these officers that the old exchange contributed to sobriety, health, and contentment of the men. The increase of desertions and trials of infractions of discipline is, by those best informed, attributed to the abolition of the former privileges of the exchange.

The Chief of Staff of the United States Army, Maj. Gen. J. Franklin Bell, in his recent report has the following to say on the subject:

This subject has been referred to in many annual reports since the passage of the law abolishing the sale of light wine and beer in post exchanges, often referred to as the anticanteen amendment.

Regular and special reports made from time to time establish the fact that the Army from the lowest rank up, is practically unanimous in its desire to have the canteen reestablished.

Even many officers who, on principle, are opposed to the use of intoxicating liquors, realize that such use can not be prevented and that the sale of beer at post exchanges would be the lesser evil.

A careful study of the matter has recently been made, and a full record made with a view of placing before you, in concise form, reasons why this law should be repealed, and the facts in support of these reasons.

In considering the subject, three periods of time are discussed—the period from 1881 to 1890, from 1891 to 1900, and from 1901 to date. The first period covers the time prior to the establishment of post exchanges, when post traders were authorized. The second, the time during which the canteen was in existence. The third, the period since its abolition. When the canteen was in operation there were fewer desertions, fewer fines and forfeitures imposed by sentence of court-martial, less alcoholism, and less venereal diseases than prior to its establishment. Since the abolition of the canteen, venereal diseases have increased, alcoholism has been slightly on the increase, fines and forfeitures imposed by sentence of court-martial have materially increased, and desertions have increased somewhat. I am satisfied that a careful consideration of the whole subject, as set forth in the special report, together with the views of department commanders, will be convincing evidence that the abolition of the canteen has resulted in injury to the service. The morals and discipline of the Army have suffered in consequence.

The Judge-Advocate-General, Brig. Gen. George B. Davis, in a recent letter to me states that in 1896 there were 1,486 trials for drunkenness and other offenses; in 1897, 1,384; in 1898, 1,880 trials, while since the canteen was abolished the number of trials for these offenses have doubled and trebled as follows:

	Cases.
1903	5,275
1905	4,800
1907	3,913

The latest report of the Surgeon-General, Brig. Gen. Robert M. O'Reilly, contains the following facts regarding venereal diseases in the Army:

Venereal diseases were again by far the most important factor affecting the efficiency of the Army during the year.

Replying to my inquiry, he states that during the canteen period the cases of venereal diseases averaged about 80 per 1,000 men, while since abolishing the canteen, the number has reached the high mark of 200 per 1,000.

Referring to the opinion of the medical officers of the Army, the Surgeon-General states:

This office concurs in the opinion expressed by most medical officers of the Army, that the abolition of the sale of beer and wine in post exchanges has had much to do with the increase of venereal diseases and alcoholism in the Army by driving soldiers to disreputable resorts outside of the post and beyond control of the post authorities.

The American Medical Association, with a membership of over 12,000, composed of the leading representatives of the medical profession in this country, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That this body deplores the action of Congress in abolishing the Army post exchange or canteen, and in the interests of discipline, morality, and sanitation recommends its reestablishment at the earliest date.

Reports from commanding officers of the various Army posts show that the number of saloons in the few years since the abolishment of the Army canteen has increased by a total of 371.

To show what effect the establishment of the canteen had on the liquor traffic outside of the posts, I cite the case of Fort Porter, where there were 70 outside saloons before the canteen was established, and this number was reduced to 3 after the sale of beer and wine was allowed within the fort.

Thus it is seen from the reports of the chief officers of our Army, men who have studied conditions, and who are faithful and conscientious in the discharge of their duties, that the abolishment of the Army canteen has been detrimental to the health, discipline, morality, and general contentment of our soldiers.

It is further seen that desertions have materially increased since the canteen was abolished and that it has become more and more difficult to enlist the required number of recruits.

How difficult it is under present conditions to find men who are willing to enter our Army, is seen from the report of a commanding officer of a battalion of the Nineteenth Infantry, stationed at Fort McIntosh, Tex.:

I have present to-day in the 4 companies, 56 men, and 23 of them are to be discharged this month. If we get no recruits, one company will have 3 men and another 4. The other two companies will have 11 and 12 men, respectively.

The difficulty of getting recruits is probably in part due to the small compensation paid to our soldiers which is materially less than is paid to men in any other line of work.

To do all the hard work required of a soldier, to go through the daily drills, practice marches, so essential in the proper training of the men, to be ready for actual war duty whenever called upon, to do all this for the paltry sum of $13 per month is more than should be expected of any man.

But this is not all. Congress, induced by persons who never took the pains to study the subject, decided to regulate the habits of the soldiers. Instead of leaving this matter in the hands of the superior officers, who of course know best how to deal with the habits of the soldiers, it was simply decided to forbid the selling of beer and light wine in the Army posts and in Veterans' Homes, thinking that this would keep the men from drinking anything stronger than water.

By one stroke of the pen they thought to make goody-goodies out of the soldiers. It was believed that the soldiers, trained in discipline, would gently submit to being robbed of the comfort and enjoyment there is in an occasional glass of beer or wine.

Probably some Members now on this floor voted for the passage of that bill who would defy anyone to take away from them what they took from the soldiers.

While they were at it they might as well have added a few words to the bill, thereby preventing the sale of tobacco, cigars, and prohibiting smoking within the Army posts or Veterans' Homes.

Because of the fact that many good mothers' sons are ruining their health by smoking, it is a wonder that the women who have been so persistent in their fight against liquor have not already started their agitation against the use of tobacco. Successful in having beer and wine thrown out of the Army posts, what should prevent them from starting a crusade against the tobacco evil?

Our $13 soldier is a good man to experiment on, and, after we have him thoroughly reformed, we will see what can be done with the sons of those women who have been so very active in bringing about these reforms in the Army, instead of first beginning at home and endeavoring to change the evil habits of their husbands and sons.

What has been accomplished by the abolishment of the canteen is clearly seen by the many reports from Army officers, the Surgeon-General, the Secretary of War, and others.

Those who simply voted for the measure to try its general effect on the Army, must, if they read the reports mentioned, have become convinced that the desired results were not obtained, but on the contrary conditions were created by it that threaten to undo all the work of those who have made every effort to build up an Army that could be relied upon in case of war.

The Latin saying, "Si vis pacem, para bellum" is as true to-day as it was in Cæsar's time. Yes, if you want peace, prepare for war. Have an Army that will do its duty, have it equipped in the best possible manner and have the discipline such that the superior officer can always depend upon his orders being promptly executed.

These superior officers tell us that since the canteen has been abolished desertions are a daily occurrence, discipline has suffered, the number of trials for drunkenness and disorderly conduct have greatly increased, to get recruits or new enlistments is almost a matter of impossibility, and worst of all, every fifth soldier in the Army is affected with venereal disease.

Now can we, who are sent here to legislate for the best interests of the country, close our ears to the urgent appeals of the superior officers in the Army?

Can we continue to allow the shocking conditions to exist that the abolishment of the canteen has brought about?

Are we here to be influenced by persons who, in their mad rage against the lesser evil, are blind to the much greater evil caused by their agitation?

Can it be true that from fear of losing a few votes we can close our eyes to the true condition of things and vote contrary to our real convictions?

If my political fate depends upon the influence of a few misguided persons in my district, I would rather go down in defeat doing my duty as dictated by my conscience than to be victorious at the polls by voting against a measure that I know to be beneficial to the best interests of my country.

When I introduced the bill for the reestablishment of the canteen I had become thoroughly convinced that such was necessary to improve conditions in our Army.

I presented this bill before you, not in behalf of the liquor interests, but to keep our soldiers from frequenting the low dives that have sprung up around the Army posts since the canteen was abolished.

My personal knowledge of the effect of the abolishment of the canteen in several Veterans' Homes also induced me to move for a reestablishment of the canteen. I know that in these Homes cases of drunkenness were of rare occurrence before, and now under the new order of things it is almost impossible to keep order.

Why, just think of the injustice of treating these old soldiers, who did their full duty for our country, like a lot of children. Having been accustomed to drinking wine or beer for years, and however moderately, they are now told they must give up the old habit; they must not take the stimulant which at their old age they are so much in need of, or, if they insist upon having it, they must sneak into the low dives that have sprung up since their clubhouse was abolished.

All this has been brought about by persons who do not reason, and who are advocating general prohibiton in order to keep some friend or member of their family from securing the so-called vile stuff.

How much better and more effective if they had taught those near them, as my dear mother has taught me, that the abuse of anything brings evil results.

I will not deny that some of the opponents of the canteen probably thought that its abolishment would advance the moral and physical welfare of the enlisted men. If this splendid object were attained, the anticanteen system would be a success.

But experience has shown that the abolishment of the canteen has had the directly opposite effect of what had been expected by its advocates, and we now know that to reestablish it means to improve the discipline and health of the soldiers and to raise the moral standard of our Army.

Knowing the true facts in the matter, as every Member has an opportunity to ascertain, Congress will fail of a public duty if it does not restore the canteen. No clamor from temperance agitators should keep us from acting in this matter for the good of the service. We certainly can not afford to trifle with our army affairs.

Now, if the committee to whom the bill has been referred has not the courage to take action on it, let them report it to the House without any recommendation, and have the Members vote for or against it—for a betterment of conditions in our Army or for a continuance and growth of the evils brought about by the abolishment of the canteen. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Army appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

REPORT OF THE INLAND WATERWAYS COMMISSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a preliminary report from the Inland Waterways Commission, which was appointed by me last March in response to a widespread interest and demand from the people. The basis of this demand lay in the general and admitted inability of the railroads to handle promptly the traffic of the country, and especially the crops of the previous fall.

This report is well worth your attention. It is thorough, conservative, sane, and just. It represents the mature judgment of a body of men exceptionally qualified, by personal experience and knowledge of conditions throughout the United States, to understand and discuss the great problem of how best to use our waterways in the interest of all the people. Unusual care has been taken to secure accuracy and balance of statement. If the report errs at all it is by overconservatism. It contains findings or statements of fact, a number of specific recommendations, and an account of inquiries still in progress, and it is based in part on statistics and other information contained in a voluminous appendix. The subject with which it deals is of critical importance both to the present and the future of our country.

Our river systems are better adapted to the needs of the people than those of any other country. In extent, distribution, navigability, and ease of use, they stand first. Yet the rivers of no other civilized country are so poorly developed, so little used, or play so small a part in the industrial life of the nation as those of the United States. In view of the use made of the rivers elsewhere, the failure to use our own is astonishing, and no thoughtful man can believe that it will last. The accompanying report indicates clearly the reasons for it and the way to end it.

The Commission finds that it was unregulated railroad competition which prevented or destroyed the development of commerce on our inland waterways. The Mississippi, our greatest natural highway, is a case in point. At one time the traffic upon it was without a rival in any country. The report shows that commerce was driven from the Mississippi by the railroads. While production was limited, the railways, with their convenient terminals, gave quicker and more satisfactory service than the waterways. Later they prevented the restoration of river traffic by keeping down their rates along the rivers, recouping themselves by higher charges elsewhere. They also acquired water fronts and terminals to an extent which made water competition impossible. Throughout the country the railways have secured such control of canals and steamboat lines that to-day inland-waterway transportation is largely in their hands. This was natural and doubtless inevitable under the circumstances, but it should not be allowed to continue unless under careful Government regulation.

Comparatively little inland freight is carried by boat which is not carried a part of its journey by rail also. As the report shows, the successful development and use of our interstate waterways will require intelligent regulation of the relations between rail and water traffic. When this is done the railways and waterways will assist instead of injure each other. Both will benefit, but the chief benefit will accrue to the people in general through quicker and cheaper transportation.

The report rests throughout on the fundamental conception that every waterway should be made to serve the people as largely and in as many different ways as possible. It is poor business to develop a river for navigation in such a way as to prevent its use for power, when by a little foresight it could be made to serve both purposes. We can not afford needlessly to sacrifice power to irrigation, or irrigation to domestic water supply, when by taking thought we may have all three. Every stream should be used to the utmost. No stream can be so used unless such use is planned for in advance. When such plans are made we shall find that, instead of interfering, one use can often be made to assist another. Each river system, from its headwaters in the forest to its mouth on the coast, is a single unit and should be treated as such. Navigation of the lower reaches of a stream can not be fully developed without the control of floods and low waters by storage and drainage. Navigable channels are directly concerned with the protection of source waters and with soil erosion, which takes the materials for bars and shoals from the richest portions of our farms. The uses of a stream for domestic and municipal water supply, for power, and in many cases for irrigation, must also be taken into full account.

The development of our inland waterways will have results far beyond the immediate gain to commerce. Deep channels along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts and from the Gulf to the Great Lakes will have high value for the national defense. The use of water power will measureably relieve the drain upon our diminishing supplies of coal, and transportation by water instead of rail only will tend to conserve our iron. Forest protection, without which river improvement can not be permanent, will at the same time help to postpone the threatened timber famine and will secure us against a total dearth of timber by providing for the perpetuation of the remaining woodlands. Irrigation will create the means of livelihood for millions of people, and supplies of pure water will powerfully promote the public health. If the policy of waterway improvement here recommended is carried out, it will affect, for good, every citizen of the Republic. The National Government must play the leading part in securing the largest possible use of our waterways; other agencies can assist and should assist, but the work is essentially national in its scope.

The various uses of waterways are now dealt with by bureaus scattered through four Federal Departments. At present, therefore, it is not possible to deal with a river system as a single problem. But the Commission here recommends a policy under which all the commercial and industrial uses of the waterways may be developed at the same time. To that end Congress should provide some administrative machinery for coordinating the work of the various Departments so far as it relates to waterways. Otherwise there will not only be delay, but the people as a whole will fail to get from our streams the benefits to which they are justly entitled.

The Commission recognizes that the cost of improving our inland waterways will be large, but far less than would be required to relieve the congestion of traffic by railway extension. The benefits of such improvement will be large also, and they will touch the daily life of our people at every point, uniting the interests of all the States and sections of our country. The cost and the benefits should be equitably distributed, by cooperation with the States and the communities, corporations, and individuals beneficially affected. I heartily concur in the Commission's recommendation to this end. Such cooperation should result in united effort in carrying out the great duty of improving our inland waterways. While we delay, our rivers remain unused, our traffic is periodically congested, and the material wealth and natural resources of the country related to waterways are being steadily absorbed by great monopolies.

Among these monopolies, as the report of the Commission points out, there is no other which threatens, or has ever threatened, such intolerable interference with the daily life of the people as the consolidation of companies controlling water power. I call your special attention to the attempt of the power corporations, through bills introduced at the present session, to escape from the possibility of Government regulation in the interests of the people. These bills are intended to enable the corporations to take possession in perpetuity of national forest lands for the purposes of their business, where and as they please, wholly without compensation to the public. Yet the effect of granting such privileges, taken together with rights already acquired under State laws, would be to give away properties of enormous value. Through lack of foresight we have formed the habit of granting without compensation extremely valuable rights amounting to monopolies on navigable streams and on the public domain. The repurchase at great expense of water rights thus carelessly given away without return has already begun in the East, and before long will be necessary in the West also. No rights involving water power should be granted to any corporations in perpetuity, but only for a length of time sufficient to allow them to conduct their business profitably. A reasonable charge should of course be made for valuable rights and privileges which they obtain from the National Government. The values for which this charge is made will ultimately, through the natural growth and orderly development of our population and industries, reach enormous amounts. A fair share of the increase should be safeguarded for the benefit of the people, from whose labor it springs. The proceeds thus secured, after the cost of administration and improvement has been met, should naturally be devoted to the development of our inland waterways.

The report justly calls attention to the fact that hitherto our national policy has been one of almost unrestricted disposition and waste of natural resources, and emphasizes the fundamental necessity for conserving these resources upon which our present and future success as a nation primarily rests. Running water is a most valuable natural asset of the people, and there is urgent need for conserving it for navigation, for power, for irrigation, and for domestic and municipal supply.

The Commission was appointed to obtain information concerning our waterways as related to the general welfare. Much work was done, but more remains to be done before a plan for their development can be prepared in detail. We need additional information on the flow of our streams, the condition of channels, the amount and cost of water traffic, the requirements for terminals, the area in each watershed which should be kept under forest, and the means of preventing soil waste and the consequent damage to our rivers. But it is neither necessary nor desirable to postpone the beginning of the work until all the facts are obtained. We have suffered heavily in the past from the lack of adequate transportation facilities, and unless a beginning is made promptly we shall suffer still more heavily in the future.

Being without funds or an expert staff, the Commission has confined itself to principles affecting the whole problem and the entire country. Its report is a plea, in the light of actual facts, for simplicity and directness in dealing with the great problem of our inland waterways in the interest of the people. It submits no specific plans or recommendations concerning even the most important projects. The first of these, of course, concerns the Mississippi and its tributaries, whose commercial development will directly affect half our people. The Mississippi should be made a loop of the sea, and work upon it should be begun at the earliest possible moment. Only less important is the Atlantic inner passage, parts of which are already under way. The inner passages along the Gulf coast should be extended and connected with the Atlantic waters. The need for the developing of the Pacific coast rivers is not less pressing. Our people are united in support of the immediate adoption of a progressive policy of inland-waterway development.

Hitherto our national policy of inland-waterway development has been largely negative. No single agency has been responsible under the Congress for making the best use of our rivers or for exercising foresight in their development. In the absence of a comprehensive plan, the only safe policy was one of repression and procrastination. Frequent changes of plan and piecemeal execution of projects have still further hampered improvement. A channel is no deeper than its shallowest reach, and to improve a river short of the point of effective navigability is a sheer waste of all it costs. In spite of large appropriations for their improvement, our rivers are less serviceable for interstate commerce to-day than they were half a century ago, and in spite of the vast increase in our population and commerce they are, on the whole, less used.

The first condition of successful development of our waterways is a definite and progressive policy. The second is a concrete general plan, prepared by the best experts available, covering every use to which our streams can be put. We shall not succeed until the responsibility for administering the policy and executing and extending the plan is definitely laid on one man or group of men who can be held accountable. Every portion of the general plan should consider and so far as practicable secure to the people the use of water for power, irrigation, and domestic supply, as well as for navigation. No project should be begun until the funds necessary to complete it promptly are provided, and no plan once under way should be changed except for grave reasons. Work once begun should be prosecuted steadily and vigorously to completion. We must make sure that projects are not undertaken except for sound business reasons, and that the best modern business methods are applied in executing them. The decision to undertake any project should rest on actual need ascertained by investigation and judgment of experts and on its relation to great river systems or to the general plan, and never on mere clamor.

The improvement of our inland waterways can and should be made to pay for itself so far as practicable from the incidental proceeds from water power and other uses. Navigation should of course be free. But the greatest return will come from the increased commerce, growth, and prosperity of our people. For this we have already waited too long. Adequate funds should be provided, by bond issue if necessary, and the work should be delayed no longer. The development of our waterways and the conservation of our forests are the two most pressing physical needs of the country. They are interdependent, and they should be met vigorously, together, and at once. The questions of organization, powers, and appropriations are now before the Congress. There is urgent need for prompt and decisive action.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 26, 1908.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that Senate bill 3023 may be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, it is my purpose this morning to submit some remarks to the Senate on one or two phases of the general subject now before the Senate, trusting to another opportunity to express my opinion with reference to some other phases of the question.

On the 15th of January last the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] introduced a bill which, omitting the enacting clause, reads as follows:

That no national banking association shall make loans for the speculative buying of stocks, bonds, and agricultural products which in the aggregate exceed its unimpaired capital and surplus.

My understanding is that this bill of the Senator from Oklahoma will be submitted as an amendment to the pending bill, and if so, it will receive my cordial support.

It is my intention to submit at the proper time the following amendment to the bill:

That from and after January 1, 1909, every national bank shall have and keep on hand in its vaults the reserve of lawful money provided for by law. All laws and parts of laws which authorize national banks to have and keep part of their reserve in other national banks are hereby repealed.

It is also my intention, Mr. President, at the proper time to submit the following amendment, which I will read. Add as new sections:

SEC. 9. It shall be unlawful for any official of the United States to deposit any public money in any national bank for the purpose of being used directly or indirectly by such bank in speculative dealing in stocks or bonds or to be used by such bank directly or indirectly in supplying funds to operators on any stock exchange to be used in dealings thereon.

SEC. 10. It shall be unlawful for any national banking association, directly or indirectly, to make demand or other loans, or give credit on its books or otherwise, or furnish money to operators on any stock exchange to be used in dealings thereon. Any national banking association violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $1,000 and in addition thereto 20 per cent of the amount of each transaction, and may also have its charter annulled and forfeited.

In a consideration of the pending bill the first and most natural inquiry is, What were the conditions which suggested it and what produced those conditions? This is as necessary in order to determine its expediency, necessity, and wisdom as it is to know the effect and cause of any phenomena of whatever character before their recurrence can be prevented, or, if that be impossible, before their hurtful effect can be relieved or mitigated.

It is not an answer to this suggestion to assert, as it might with pertinency be done in some cases, that the danger is so pressing and imminent that we must apply a remedy without considering the disease, for it is admitted by those in charge of the measure that for the present the peril has passed and that the bill is intended for the future, not for the present.

The bill, moreover, Mr. President, is based upon the false hypothesis that what occurred in October can not be prevented; that it is inherent in our business system, and that the chief need of legislation is to palliate the inevitable. Indeed, the pending bill gives public notice that such panics as this, panics which are inconceivable in any other commercial country except this, may be repeated, and the operation of the bill will give additional power to those whose machinations and lawlessness inspire, create, or aggravate such calamitous financial disturbances.

Mr. President, when that is accomplished, when the demand of the great banks is met, when bondholding financiers and institutions are by law furnished other markets for their securities, it is true an indefinite promise is made that the grievances of the general public which grew out of such monetary derangement will be considered. But the public must wait, according to this single-shotted bill, until those are satisfied who have already fattened upon a national disaster, their selfishness heightened or created.

It is, perhaps, a safe prediction to declare now that points of order will be made against substantial amendments to this bill, and, if not sustained, that the amendments will be rejected by the majority in this Chamber; and the only legislation of consequence on the subject at this session will be this measure, the effect of which will still further enrich that class whose profits during the panic were unconscionable and fabulous.

It can not be too often declared, Mr. President, nor be too deeply impressed on the American people that the recent panic can not be ascribed to natural or industrial causes. Nothing the common people did, no visitation of Providence, no failure in soil, or shop, or mine, or countingroom was responsible for it and for the havoc which hovered over the land. By some it is believed to have been deliberately fabricated for selfish purposes; by others, like the President of the United States, it is believed to have begun as a matter of speculation. Whether these beliefs as to its origin be well or ill founded, it is certain that the panic was inexcusable and unwarranted by conditions and that in some of its phases it was criminal and infamous.

If, therefore, the matters which produced it can be discovered and removed, if there were monetary surroundings and environments which enabled unscrupulous speculators to traffic in the prosperity of the people, and which the law can render impossible again, this should be done, and done now. To postpone or delay it would be an offense and a crime against the vast public interests which may be imperiled.

Turn where we may in search of natural or industrial causes for it, none can be discovered. Agriculture was remunerative; labor was employed at fair wages, and manufacturing industries were profitable. Commercial enterprises everywhere were prosperous; common carriers were taxed with business beyond their capacity, and the excess of exports over imports for 1907 was $500,000,000, more than half of which accrued during October, November, and December.

Nor, Mr. President, can any reason for the panic be found in a consideration of the volume of money in the country or in its actual circulation when the panic began in October. The total stock of money in the United States in June, 1906, using round numbers, was $3,069,000,000, which was ample to maintain the exceptional prosperity of that year, and in June, 1907, it had increased $45,000,000, making a total of $3,114,000,000.

The per capita circulation in the United States, amounting to nearly $34, was the greatest in any country except France. In June, 1906, the amount of money held in cash by the national and all other banks which made reports was $1,010,000,000, while in June, 1907, this had increased to $1,106,000,000, or a gain in one year of $96,000,000.

The same conclusion is reached, that there was sufficient money and that it was in circulation and not hoarded, if we look to the individual deposits in the banks. These deposits increased from 1906 to 1907 $267,000,000 in national banks, and in all the reporting banks $880,000,000. The individual deposits in all national banks, already exceeding $4,000,000,000, increased $50,000,000 from March 22 to August 22, 1907, immediately preceding the panic.

As indicating the sound cash condition of all national banks, they had in their vaults August 22, 1907, $26,000,000 in checks and other cash items, $170,000,000 in legal-tender notes, and $531,000,000 in specie, aggregating the enormous sum of $727,000,000 in available cash. The national banks of New York City at that time had $5,000,000 in checks and other cash items in their vaults, $45,000,000 in legal-tender notes, and $173,000,000 in specie, aggregating $223,000,000 in ready money. This was still the same general condition, Mr. President, when the stringency arose a month or six weeks later, and, obviously, therefore, the origin of the panic can not be charged to a decline in agriculture or commerce or manufacture, nor can it be attributed to an insufficient volume of money or that it was hoarded and not in circulation.

With this healthy condition in every sphere of human effort, with more money in existence and in circulation than ever before in our history, with the coffers of the banks bursting with cash, almost instantly, in October, a financial crisis was precipitated which created consternation and injury and which threatened immeasurable destruction. According to the highest banking authority in the Government, the Comptroller of the Currency, the origin of the panic was the demand for liquidation and the collapse of a desperate gambling venture in stocks in New York which involved a national bank of that city. The distrust of the depositors, which was due to the fear and to the knowledge that the banks of that city were speculating in stocks and bonds, was immediately aroused, and runs were made on a number of banks in that city, and liquidation of stock-and-bond demand loans, in which banks and stock gamblers were interested, was demanded and forced. There were disgraceful and indescribable scenes on the stock exchange.

The clearing-house banks of New York City ceased cash payments to depositors, practically suspended shipments to their interior bank correspondents on calls for their reserve, and issued sham currency in scrip and certificates in lieu of money, while coin lay in heaps around them.

This course was followed by banks of other cities and towns, portions of whose reserve were held in New York, domestic exchanges were disordered, and collections and remittances waited upon the pleasure of banks and the resumption of cash payments.

This illegal and indefensible action of banks occasioned widespread injustice and damage. Values everywhere were adversely affected, business enterprises were arrested, the confidence of the public in banks was impaired, wageworkers were compelled to discount checks for their earnings on solvent banks, and the South suffered incalculable injury from inability to handle and move the cotton crop.

This great calamity, great in its effect and still greater in what was threatened, is traceable in its inception not to an inadequate volume of money nor to the hoarding of money, but to two underlying causes, one the law governing the bank reserve and the other the participation of national banks of New York City and their associated interests in illegitimate banking, in the scandal and peril of stock gambling, which is born of avarice and greed and that most sordid and despicable of all human cravings—riches without labor.

Under the reserve law, "central reserve" national banks are those in New York, Chicago, and St. Louis where 25 per cent of the deposits is required to be kept in cash by the banks; "reserve" national banks are those of certain other cities where 25 per cent of deposits is required, half of which, however, may be kept in "central reserve" banks; and all other national banks, sometimes called "country banks," are those which are required to keep 15 per cent of their deposits in cash, three-fifths of which, though, may be deposited in "reserve" and "central reserve" banks. The operation of this law, and doubtless that was its purpose, is to concentrate money in the commercial centers, chiefly in New York, and particularly in the noncrop-moving season of the year. This movement of money to the commercial centers is accelerated and encouraged by Eastern holdings in interior banks and by the unwise and unsafe practice of reserve and central reserve banks paying interest on the reserve as deposits. As these banks which pay interest on the reserve as deposits can not afford to lose money on the transactions, they loan the deposits, taking greater risks than usual and often using them in promotive and speculative ventures, and when the need of the interior banks for their reserve is most pressing the reserve-holding banks are unwilling or unable to respond to their calls. At all times the legal reserve should be maintained in the bank of original deposit to meet the primary purpose of its creation—the protection of depositors. It will tend to give confidence to depositors and will meet any probable demand they may make for their funds. Banks which are authorized to loan 75 per cent of the money of their depositors in the case of reserve and central reserve banks and 85 per cent in the case of country banks should not be heard to complain of a requirement to retain in their vaults 25 and 15 per cent, respectively, of the money belonging to depositors to meet calls for their own. The contrary proposition, especially when deposits are not otherwise fully protected or secured—that the actual cash reserve shall be less than 15 and 25 per cent, respectively—would congest money in the trade centers, remove it from the field of local demands, is principally in the interest of larger dividends to stockholders of banks, encourages speculation, invites monetary disorders and panics, and is, in my judgment, with due respect to others, unreasonable and indefensible. Even a larger reserve is required in Great Britain and other nations, and in the case of United States deposits full security in bonds is properly exacted. The depositors should not be denied this protection and the whole country be made to incur the danger and peril of panics in order that the loaning capacity of banks may be increased 15 and 25 per cent.

Mr. President, how the existing reserve law may operate to the disorder and destruction of the business interests of the country was thoroughly disclosed in the recent stringency. On August 22, 1907, the reserve banks had with their reserve agents, the central reserve banks, $194,000,000 of their legal reserve, and the country banks had with their reserve agents, the reserve and central reserve banks, $420,000,000 of their legal reserve, aggregating $614,000,000. The national banks of New York City at that time held $213,000,000 of the reserve of other banks, and $251,000,000 of their demand loans at that time was on stocks and bonds. When, during the panic, urgent and clamorous calls were made by the interior banks for their reserve of this vast sum of money, the New York City banks sent only $10,820,511, or 5 per cent, in liquidation of their reserve indebtedness.

Mr. ALDRICH. Of just what period is the Senator from Texas speaking?

Mr. CULBERSON. I am speaking of the period from August 22 to December 3.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator mean to be understood that the New York national banks only shipped the small amount which he has named to the country banks within that period?

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Texas means to state, Mr. President, that the reserve indebtedness of the New York City banks to all other banks in the country was reduced only the net amount of $10,820,511 during that time.

All other banks holding reserve money, whether they were central reserve or reserve banks, sent only $78,000,000, or 22 per cent, in net liquidation of their reserve indebtedness. More than that, sir, instead of responding to the call of the interior banks for their reserve, the national banks of New York City sold money at extortionate rates to banks and others, increased their demand loans on stocks and bonds $50,000,000, and openly, and apparently with the knowledge of the officials of the Government, loaned money to operators on the stock exchange, much of it going indirectly from the National Treasury.

The result, Mr. President, necessarily was that the interior banks, with their reserve tied up and entangled in the meshes of speculation, were seriously and inextricably involved with the New York banks, and this panic, which, except for this entanglement, would not have occurred, or would have been but a local riot of frenzied money changers, spread through the land and became national in its iniquity and in its burden. If the bill of the Senator from Rhode Island had then been law, it would only have added to the revelry and multiplied the gains of the financiers and syndicates whose profits already ran into uncounted millions.

Mr. President, that the national banks of New York City deal in speculative stocks and bonds, often encroaching upon their reserve, and loan money to operators on the stock exchange is indisputable. The reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, when analyzed, establish it, and it is common knowledge in New York.

In August, 1907, their demand loans on stocks and bonds amounted to $251,000,000, or 35 per cent of their total loans; and in December, 1907, notwithstanding the panic, notwithstanding the demand of the interior banks for their reserve, notwithstanding the demand of the depositors, their demand loans on stocks and bonds amounted to $302,000,000, or 38 per per cent of their total loans.

In confirmation of the statement that the banks participate in stock gambling, let me submit some contemporaneous history. Before I do that, however, let me say that the four principal banks of New York City, whose operations were a matter of public concern during this panic, were the First National Bank, the Chase National Bank, which belong to the Morgan interests, and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, which belong to the Standard Oil interests. These four national banks, it is said, had on deposit four-fifths of the public money deposited by the Treasury Department during the two weeks of the panic, and, according to its report, made on the 14th day of this month, the Standard Oil bank, the National City Bank, had on deposit over $13,000,000 of public money without interest.

Mr. President, coming to the contemporaneous history to which I referred, I have here excerpts taken from the New York Sun from October 23, 1907, down to and including October 26, which I will ask to be inserted in the body of my remarks without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted to insert the excerpts to which the Senator from Texas refers.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Sun.]

October 23, 1907:

Mr. Oakleigh Thorne, president of the Trust Company of America, said:

"A deposit of $20,000,000 by the Government would relieve the whole situation. Of course the money going into the banks would not have any direct effect on the trust companies, but indirectly it would have a great effect. At present the trust companies would be absolutely secure if they could call in their demand loans. These loans are secured by collateral, which, while of undoubted value, is not at all readily marketable. As it stands now these borrowers, or some of them, are unable to borrow enough to pay these loans. A deposit of the funds in the banks would make it possible for them to do this and relieve the trust companies of their burdens."

George B. Cortelyou, Secretary of the Treasury, arrived at Jersey City on the Congressional Limited last night.

It was understood to be his belief that the action he took several weeks ago in making several large deposits in various national banks throughout the country that are Government depositaries to facilitate the movement of crops will, in a measure, restrict the present money difficulties to New York.

After Secretary Cortelyou arrived at the Hotel Manhattan, Mr. Fish, subtreasurer at New York, went out to notify prominent financial men of his presence. The first to arrive was George W. Perkins, of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. Frank A. Vanderlip, vice-president, and George F. Baker, president, of the First National Bank, arrived later and went to Secretary Cortelyou's room. President A. B. Hepburn, of the Chase National, also came.

There were no emergency deposits of Government moneys in the New York banks. Deposits under the Secretary's former order were, however, made to a moderate extent in a few of the institutions. But as far as the day's business was concerned, there was no Treasury relief which was of any material benefit.

It was very regrettable that only a comparatively small number of the larger banking institutions appeared on the stock exchange to-day as lenders of money.

Money is now not scarce at this center—indeed, it may be said to be in relative abundance, especially in view of the deposits of public funds made during the day by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the more than likelihood that the deposits will be greatly augmented within a few hours. That money rates should have been allowed to run as high as 70 per cent to-day was an utterly censurable feature of the situation.

There was a subsequent decline to 40 per cent (for call money) on offerings made principally by the First National Bank. While the other banks were holding back, the First National loaned an aggregate of five millions.

In the opinion of bankers who favored the offering of money the situation was one that warranted on the part of every bank in the Clearing House Association a decrease of 5 per cent in reserve. It was argued that the theory of maintaining the reserve is very largely for protection in times of stress, and that the situation yesterday certainly justified protection of the market, so that those banks with call loans might be able to secure the amount of the loan by the sale of securities.

October 24, 1907:

Secretary of the Treasury George B. Cortelyou deposited substantial sums in Government money in national banks yesterday, and a group of bankers, headed by J. P. Morgan, stood behind the Trust Company of America.

Bankers were in conference with the Secretary constantly throughout the day, and there was a series of conferences at the office of J. P. Morgan & Co., participated in by the most prominent financiers of the city.

Both Secretary Cortelyou and the Morgan banking syndicates amply fulfilled the agreements made after the late bank conference the night before.

Secretary Cortelyou * * * gave assistance to the amount, it was estimated, of about $7,000,000. This money was put in national banks for one specific purpose, and the banks held it in support of the Trust Company of America or turned it over to that institution.

The Secretary did not concern himself with the stock-market operations, the scarcity of money on stock-exchange loans, or the condition of the general money market. Apparently his work was directed effectively toward "assisting in every proper way legitimate business interests," to quote the language of his statement the night before.

Across the street from the subtreasury, at the office of J. P. Morgan & Co., arrangements were made for putting into effect the agreement made the night before to support the Trust Company of America in case the institution on examination was found to be solvent. These arrangements were carried out through the two principal banks of the so-called "Morgan interests" and the two principal banks commonly associated with the Standard Oil interests—the First National and Chase National, of the Morgan group, and the National City and Hanover National, of the other.

The First National loaned five millions, at an average of about 50 per cent.

October 25, 1907:

The Secretary (Cortelyou), who had expected to place twenty-five millions in the national banks, found that this large amount was not needed, so that there remain of the twenty-five millions a considerable sum, which is at the disposal of national banks to-day.

In addition to the deposit of large sums in the big banks in the financial districts, Mr. Cortelyou advanced considerable amounts to the mercantile banks, of the type of the Chemical, for instance, and to smaller institutions farther uptown.

At 2.20 p. m. there appeared on the floor of the exchange, Vernon Mann, of Mann, Bill & Wise, loan brokers, and two prominent Morgan brokers—Messrs. Rogers and Atterbury. They had commissions to place twenty millions of the Morgan money.

The money was offered first in $100,000 lots, and was snapped up inside of five minutes. In the hurry to secure loans few brokers stopped to consider the money rates. (Five million was sent in by this same pool before the market closed, in addition to this twenty millions.)

The money advanced by the Morgan syndicate was loaned at rates from 10 to 50 per cent. * * * In the morning there was placed about $800,000 for the National Copper Bank at 50 per cent. * * * Vernon Mann placed three millions for the First National Bank at 50 per cent.

J. P. Morgan & Co. headed the syndicate, and there were associated with this banking house the First National Bank, the Chase National, the National City, Hanover National, Fourth National, National Park, and National Bank of Commerce.

The funds loaned by Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co. to-day represented, as was understood, the contributions not only of the firm, but of several of the leading banks in the city to a pool formed for the purpose of relieving the money market, and the indirect source of the supply was unquestionably the money deposited in the banks of the city to-day by the National Treasury. Undoubtedly this relief would have been earlier extended had the banks been enabled to complete more rapidly their arrangements for depositing the necessary security with the Government for the money thus advanced. The great obstacle presented in this operation was of course the relatively sparse supply of high-grade bonds now in the possession of the banks, available for the purposes required.

October 26, 1907:
Secretary Cortelyou continued the deposit of Treasury money in the national banks. J. P. Morgan & Co. and the banks associated with that firm in the work of restoring normal conditions again supplied funds for the call-money market.

October 26, 1907:
While on Thursday it was necessary for the bankers to raise twenty-five millions in order to relieve the then acute stringency in the call-money market, and an aggregate of approximately thirty-five millions was loaned, on the floor of the stock exchange yesterday the Morgan syndicates put out but fifteen millions, and an aggregate of twenty millions sufficed to meet all demands.
Renewals of the syndicate money placed on Thursday were made at 20 per cent.
The First National Bank sent in the first block of two millions, which was loaned at 50 per cent. Between 1 and 2 o'clock other amounts were loaned by various institutions and banking houses—notably one million by the Chase National and $400,000 by the Liberty National—at the same figure.
The money (of the Morgan syndicate) was placed at a uniform rate of 50 per cent.
The process of depositing Government money in the banks proceeded smoothly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, I desire, with the indulgence of the Senate, to emphasize two or three statements which are made in these articles. One of them is this:

Money is now not scarce at this center—indeed, it may be said to be in relative abundance——

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the date of the article from which the Senator from Texas is now reading?

Mr. CULBERSON. October 23, 1907. The article continues:

Especially in view of the deposits of public funds made during the day by the Secretary of the Treasury and the more than likelihood that the deposits will be greatly augmented within a few hours.

Another of these extracts reads:

In the opinion of bankers who favored the offering of money, the situation was one that warranted on the part of every bank in the clearing-house association a decrease of 5 per cent in reserve. It was argued that the theory of maintaining the reserve is very largely for protection in times of stress and that the situation yesterday certainly justified protection of the market, so that those banks with call loans might be able to secure the amount of the loan by the sale of securities.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish to ask only a simple question. Does the Senator understand the word "money," as used there, as a synonym for "currency" or for loanable capital?

Mr. CULBERSON. I would, of course, yield to the better judgment of the Senator from Rhode Island upon that point.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no doubt it was intended there as loanable capital and not as currency.

Mr. CULBERSON. I can not myself construe this article except by its very terms, and it says:

Money is now not scarce at this center—indeed, it may be said to be in relative abundance.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator is quite as well aware as I am that that word is used in the press of New York and elsewhere throughout the country.

Mr. CULBERSON. Possibly so, Mr. President. Now, another extract, in passing along:

Across the street from the subtreasury, at the office of J. P. Morgan & Co., arrangements were made for putting into effect the agreement made the night before to support the Trust Company of America, in case the institution on examination was found to be solvent. These arrangements were carried out through the two principal banks of the so-called "Morgan interests," and the two principal banks commonly associated with the Standard Oil interests—the First National and Chase National of the Morgan group, and the National City and Hanover National of the other.

Here is still another of these extracts:

The funds loaned by Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co. to-day represented, as was understood, the contributions not only of the firm, but of several of the leading banks in the city, to a pool formed for the purpose of relieving the money market, and the indirect source of the supply was unquestionably the money deposited in the banks of the city to-day by the National Treasury. Undoubtedly this relief would have been earlier extended had the banks been enabled to complete more rapidly their arrangements for depositing the necessary security with the Government for the money thus advanced. The great obstacle presented in this operation was, of course, the relatively sparse supply of high-grade bonds now in the possession of the banks, available for the purposes required.

Still another:

While on Thursday it was necessary for the bankers to raise twenty-five millions in order to relieve the then acute stringency in the call-money market, and an aggregate of approximately thirty-five millions was loaned, on the floor of the stock exchange yesterday, the Morgan syndicate put out but fifteen millions, and an aggregate of twenty millions sufficed to meet all demands.

So much for the New York Sun. Mr. President, in something more of detail, with the indulgence of Senators who honor me with their attention, let me read from the New York Herald.

[Extracts from the New York Herald.]

Cooperating with the bankers was George B. Cortelyou, Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Cortelyou was visited by all the leading New York bankers and his assistance was extended at a critical time. There had been $8,000,000 deposited the day before, and it is understood that between eight and ten millions was made available.
The First National Bank, J. P. Morgan & Co., the Chase National Bank, and the National City Bank were among the chief lenders. A pool had been formed among several banks, and it is understood most of the fund was lent. Through the Hanover National Bank, Mann, Bill & Co., money brokers, placed $8,000,000 for a money pool. It is believed that the Hanover people lent about $5,000,000. Despite the vigorous measures of Mr. Cortelyou and the assistance of the various bankers' pools, call money ran up to 100 per cent. It was reported after the close that the Bank of Montreal's local agent lent $200,000 at 125 per cent. The demand for money was so great that almost any price could be obtained. The Morgan firm and the First National Bank and other large banks had many requests from brokers to be carried over.
After the close of the stock market, Mann, Bill & Co. made the following statement: "*Throughout the excited scenes on the stock exchange to-day, large sums of money on call were loaned by the First National Bank, the National City Bank, and the Hanover National Bank. These banks sent in sums ranging from $1,000,000 to $5,000,000. * * * At 2 o'clock the First National Bank sent in one block of $5,000,000, which was distributed among the eager borrowers.*" (Herald October 24, 1907.)

Nowhere was the absolute scarcity of money so strikingly apparent as on the stock exchange, and it was only through the drastic measures adopted by the bankers and the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. that the situation was relieved. Between 1 and 2 o'clock, when the officers of the exchange observed that there was nothing offering in the shape of brokerage loans, they consulted among themselves. It was clear that, unless funds were obtained, and $20,000,000 was needed at 2 o'clock, something of an extraordinary nature would have to be done. * * * One of the governors made a hurried canvass of the situation on the floor of the exchange, and reported that there was about $200,000 offering, and about $18,000,000 was wanted at the moment. This information was communicated to the banks. Mr. Stillman, of the National City; Mr. Baker, of the First National, and J. P. Morgan were told precisely the dilemma in which the New York Stock Exchange found itself at that hour of yesterday. In less than five minutes the telephone bells were ringing and a money pool was formed. In this pool eight or nine banks participated under the leadership of J. P. Morgan & Co. Drastic measures were adopted, the banks encroached upon their reserves, and what will go down in financial history as the Morgan money pool was formed. In this pool $25,000,000 was pledged by the Morgan firm. When it came in the stock exchange a riot almost occurred. * * * Call money had touched 100 per cent in the early afternoon. * * * This rate was a surprise to many, who believed that the extraordinary action of Secretary Cortelyou in ordering a deposit of $25,000,000 would relieve the situation. * * * When money touched 100 per cent, Mr. Cortelyou was not dismayed, and it was clear that it was his judgment that the brokers ought to be restrained from any activity at a time when the funds were needed so urgently elsewhere.
The clearing house was aware that a $25,000,000 pool had been formed to take care of stock exchange business, and it is believed that the measures adopted under the circumstances were praiseworthy. It was ascertained that the National City Bank was one of the largest subscribers to the money pool, and, with J. P. Morgan & Co., furnished $10,000,000, the First National Bank, which had placed about $4,000,000 earlier in the day, subscribed $3,000,000, the Chase $2,000,000, the Fourth $1,000,000, the Bank of Commerce $2,000,000, the Hanover $1,000,000, and the Corn Exchange $1,000,000. All this money was placed at the disposal of Mr. Morgan, and through his brokers the funds were thrown on the exchange. It was found that the offerings were more than the brokers required, and the balance was placed among several different institutions at the close. Every brokerage firm in Wall street was able to obtain all the funds required. The money rate dropped from 50 per cent to 10 per cent under the flood of offerings. (Herald, October 25, 1907.)

Wall street brokerage houses were well provided with funds again yesterday by the bankers' pool, acting under the direction of J. P. Morgan. Upward of $10,000,000 additional was lent in the market, making $30,000,000 in all now placed on the street to aid the brokers. * * * This money was loaned at from 50 to 60 per cent. * * *

Mr. President, we have heard a good deal about money being sent to the outside to move the crops. Listen to this:

By far the most aggravating demands made yesterday upon the local banks were those from out-of-town institutions. Coupled with senseless and frightened demands from those at home, these fresh drains were felt severely. In some cases they were refused, and in others, where the banks wished to draw down currency, they were told their demands would have to wait. In the fierce battle going on in Wall street all possible cash obtainable was called into action, and the outskirts were left to face the condition of distress as best they might. (Herald, October 26, 1907.)
J. P. Morgan and James Stillman, two of the great bankers, have resolutely opposed all former overtures for the issuance of clearing-house certificates. * * * But in the opinion of a majority of the members last night, the time has now arrived to put aside sentiment and adopt drastic measures to relieve the situation. In anticipation of such a situation *the word went forth from high quarters that the shipments of currency to the interior and other quarters were to cease. * * * Cooperating with J. P. Morgan and Mr. Cortelyou in stemming the unnecessary demands for funds are the brokers and stock exchange leaders.* * * *
Relief came in another bankers' pool managed by J. P. Morgan & Co. On the previous day $25,000,000 had been supplied, and to furnish these funds the bankers encroached upon their legal reserves. The same was done yesterday, but the amount supplied was smaller. Morgan & Co. had at their disposal about $10,000,000, which was given to a group of brokers. The members of the pool were the stronger banks—the City, Chase, First, Hanover, Corn Exchange, Fourth, American Exchange, and Bank of Commerce—the Morgan firm also participating. Rates for call money had ranged all day between 50 and 80 per cent.

Morgan's funds were placed at 50 per cent. There was no breaking the rate, and everyone was forced to pay the same. (Herald, October 26, 1907.)

Mr. President, if this be true—and I believe it to be true—it is a discreditable story to go to the American people, a story of violated law, of business dishonesty and immorality, of the perversion of banking, and of the subordination of the Federal Treasury to powerful private interests. What we need, therefore, in my judgment, is not necessarily more currency, and especially not more bank-issued and bond-secured currency such as is contemplated by this bill—a bill which violates the fundamental principle that Government, not private corporations, should issue money; a bill which will augment the power of the great banks and give an added and speculative value to bonds in bondholding centers against less-favored communities and the vast interests of the interior. What we need, Mr. President, rather, is honest, legitimate banking, unassociated with high finance, drastic laws against the use of public funds and bank resources for promotive, speculative, and gambling purposes, and the dispersion, not the congestion, of the money of the land. When that is effected, when banks confine themselves to the business of banking, when they cease loaning their funds on the collateral of Wall street, when they no longer cast their money into the vortex of the exchange to reap the fruits of shameless usury and steady the value of fluctuating securities in which they have invested, and when the law is so reformed that the lawful money reserve of every community remains at home, a panic of banks, such as that of October, will be impossible, and an emergency currency based upon it questionable, if not wholly unnecessary.

But, Mr. President, it is said that the fiat has gone forth, and that this bill will become a law. It will not surprise me. For forty years the money power, in financial legislation, has dominated the Republic. Since the so-called act to strengthen the public credit, from the packing of the Supreme Court of the United States in the legal-tender cases, through all gradations from that time down to the law of last year, which gave to the national banks without interest the use of $250,000,000 of public money, its mastery has been complete. Perhaps its control and its dominance will continue until the end. However that may be, this bill emphasizes the flagrant and continuous injustice which the people bear in legislation which makes unearned additions to individual wealth and private fortune.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I do not intend at this time to attempt to traverse some of the statements made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], but I desire to call his attention to one fact, which I hope he may enlighten the Senate upon later on. The Senator from Texas opened his statement this morning by saying that he was in favor and should support the substitute for this bill offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. CULBERSON. Not at all. The Senator misunderstood me. I said I would support an amendment which I understood the Senator from Oklahoma would propose on the subject of stock gambling. Unfortunately for me, I have not had time to read the Senator's bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not necessary for me, then, to go on with the statement I was about to make. I did not understand the Senator in that way. I understood him to say that he should vote for the proposition of the Senator from Oklahoma, and I was hoping that he would at some time point out the difference between that bill and the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am fully conscious of the fact that in the matter of finance and the adjustment of our currency I am far from being an expert, and whatever I have to say on this subject I shall say with a good deal of diffidence and reservation.

To my mind the lessons conveyed by the recent panic indicate that the bill under consideration will not meet the evils disclosed by the panic. Our national banks are not only banks of issue, but they are banks of commerce, banks of discount and deposit, and the recent panic has disclosed not so much a vice in our currency system as a vice in the methods of banking. In other words, it disclosed vicious, irregular, and unlawful methods of banking.

There is no lack of currency in this country. In the panic of 1893 we had only a little more than $24 per capita, while at the outbreak of the late panic we had over $32 per capita of money among the people of the United States. It seems to me the great object to be accomplished by any system of remedial legislation is to keep the money of the country in circulation. The loanable funds of the banks are chiefly the moneys of the depositors.

Take the national banks in the aggregate. The total amount of their capital and surplus is only $1,650,000,000, and their note issue at this time, the highest in all their history, is only $690,000,000. That capital and that surplus and that note issue are only a limited part of the loanable funds of the banks. The great bulk of the loanable funds of the banks are derived from the money of their depositors.

On the 3d of December last the aggregate amount of capital and surplus of our national banks was $1,651,000,000; the total amount of individual deposits was $4,176,000,000; the deposits of other banks were $1,387,000,000, and the Government deposits, $223,000,000. A total of all kinds of deposits of $5,786,000,000, and the total of bank notes issued was $690,000,000.

It appears that the national banks practically have all their capital and surplus tied up in bonds and similar securities and other permanent investments. The total amount of such bonds and investments is $1,603,000,000, leaving only $48,000,000 of their capital, surplus, and undivided profits available for commercial loans, while the ordinary loans and discounts of the banks amounted at this time to $4,585,000,000—only $400,000,000 less than the individual deposits.

Mr. President, in my judgment the great consideration to be attained in any system of banking is to preserve such a state of confidence among the people of the country that they will not only deposit their surplus money in the banks, but will let it remain there during periods of great commercial demands. It is well known that under normal business conditions, when confidence prevails throughout the country, from 90 to 95 per cent of the business of the country is transacted by a transfer of credits. There is very little occasion for currency. But the moment a panic sets in, the moment there is a run on the banks, currency becomes scarce from two causes; first, because there is a depletion of the currency by the run of the depositors on the banks; and in the next place there is a greater demand for currency, because the people, instead of having business transactions liquidated by a transfer of credits as under normal conditions, now want the cash. On the one side greater depletion, on the other side greater demand.

To my mind we ought not to lose sight of this important question, and in order to bring before the Senate the points which I aim to make I shall refer briefly to the panic of 1893 and compare it with the panic of 1907. The panic of 1893, Senators will remember, came when we were in the midst of industrial stagnation. Many mills, furnaces, and factories were either idle or run on reduced time. Hundreds and thousands of laboring men were thrown out of employment. The railroads had greatly reduced traffic and earnings. Stagnation prevailed on all sides. But the worst of all in the panic of 1893 and the direct cause which led to the great withdrawal of funds from the banks and the channels of trade was not the lack of confidence in the banks per se, but the lack of confidence in our currency. At that time the fear was entertained throughout the country that we were liable to lapse into a state of silver monometallism. We were then purchasing silver and inflating our currency therewith at the rate of 4,500,000 ounces per month, and there was a constant and continued withdrawal of gold from the Treasury and the shipment of the same to Europe. The bankers and brokers of New York would week after week go to the subtreasury with greenbacks, draw the gold from the Treasury, and ship it to Europe, and our gold reserve was depleted to the very lowest point in our history except, perhaps, in 1894 and 1895. In short, we were seriously threatened with silver monometallism.

In the panic of 1893 what induced people to withdraw their money and hoard it was the fear that we would lapse into a state of silver monometallism; that people who deposited in the banks good money, worth a hundred cents on the dollar in gold, were liable to get it back in depreciated silver currency worth less than half that amount. The same fear induced hoarding and a disinclination to embark in industrial enterprises or ventures of any kind. In short, it was a well-grounded alarm as to the integrity of our currency.

In the recent panic there never was any question about the soundness of our currency. No man in this country doubted that the money he carried in his pocket was good money and had been ever since we passed the gold-standard law of 1900. There was no want of confidence in our currency. The lack of confidence was in our banks and their methods. The trouble was that that confidence so essential to business integrity and business prosperity, that confidence so necessary to induce depositors to let their money remain in the banks and not withdraw it, was lacking.

There is something curious about the panic of 1907 and its surroundings. During the entire year immediately preceding the panic the country was in the highest state of industrial and agricultural prosperity. We had raised a most bountiful crop throughout the country. Our cotton and wheat crop was especially good, and prices for these products and all agricultural crops were high. The farmers were prosperous. Our factories, furnaces, mills, and shops were running at full time and had orders ahead, and to my knowledge our railroads in the Northwest were so burdened with traffic that oftentimes they could not furnish the necessary cars for shipment of crops to market as promptly as desired. Prosperity was smiling upon us on all sides and there was no lack of currency in the great Northwest. Our banks had ample currency to supply the local demand and in many instances were carrying Eastern commercial loans.

There was one thing that struck me as very strange in the midst of this prosperity, and it was this: All during last spring and early summer, and even during the preceding winter when our business men and bankers occasionally went to the East, to New York, they would come back and shake their heads and look dubious and say: "There is going to be a panic in the fall. There is going to be a financial stringency." We, who stayed at home, who did not visit the financial center of the country, could not understand it; but somehow or other those who went to the East and conferred with the wise men of the East, especially the bankers, came back impressed with the idea that we were bound, in some shape or after some fashion, to have a panic in the fall of 1907. It seems that the big financiers in New York counted upon and looked for a general financial stringency, if not panic, and it was a great mystery to us, in the midst of our great prosperity, how this could be, and we in our innocence came to look upon them as false prophets.

Now, what brought on the panic? Of course no one of us can well point out all of the causes, but in my opinion some of the most radical causes are obvious and lie on the surface. In the period immediately preceding the panic for several years the stock market of the country had been excessively inflated, both in quantity and value. It had got to be the fashion for years, whenever any industrial enterprise was contemplated and embarked in, whenever it was the purpose to build a railroad, to open a mine, or to engage in any other venture, to form a corporation and to issue as much common and preferred stock and as many bonds as could be floated and absorbed, oftentimes much in excess of the active requirement of the enterprise. There is, and for many years has been, in New York a market place for all kinds of stock—the New York Stock Exchange. There are various kinds and large quantities of stock always kept on hand and offered for sale and oftentimes gambled in in this market.

Let me classify some of them. There is one class I would term the regular stocks of good, going concerns. Another class are the stocks of promoters—men who organize new ventures and put the stocks and bonds of these new ventures on the market. It is estimated by a New York financial journal that upward of $2,000,000,000 of new stocks and bonds were put upon the market in 1907. Then there is another class, the underwriting class—the men who take great blocks of stock by the wholesale at a low figure from some enterprise or some concern—it may be a new concern or a going concern—to peddle them out and unload them on the dear public at retail at as great profit as possible. The men who handle these various kinds of stocks resort to a variety of methods to inflate and enhance their price. The greater the inflation the greater the profit.

From day to day these stocks are sold on the New York Stock Exchange, and there are a lot of brokers there who live just by this system of speculation and carry it on with borrowed money. This system of stock speculation on the New York Stock Exchange leads to an evil in connection with our banking system, already referred to by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. It is the system of demand or call loans.

The business man, the merchant, or the manufacturer can not indulge in loans of that kind. These loans are not commercial loans, are not commercial paper. These loans are simply stock exchange loans on stock collaterals, to carry and float stocks. A large share of the loanable funds of the banks of New York, as appears from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, are loans of this class. On the 22d of August last upward of 38 per cent of the loans of the banks of New York were call or demand loans, and the volume was still greater on the eve of the panic. As I have said, a merchant, a manufacturer, an ordinary business man, does not make loans of that kind—call loans. His loans are time loans. All of these call loans are loans used for stock speculation, and are to that extent a diversion from the regular channels of trade, industry, and commerce. It is estimated by a financial journal that upward of $2,000,000,000 of additional stocks and bonds, partly of new enterprises and partly of old, were put upon the New York stock market during the year 1907. It is the effort to absorb, digest, and float all this volume of inflated stocks and bonds that diverts so much money from industrial and commercial channels that in a large measure leads to financial stringency. It was the institutions that carried so many of these stock collateral loans that felt the greatest pressure and that in so many instances succumbed. These stocks were of little avail when purchasers could get no money to buy with.

Now, how did it come to pass that during the early days of last fall many of the wholesalers, manufacturers, and jobbers of New York and other eastern cities would come to the country banks of the Northwest to make their commercial time loans?

They could not get them in New York. The big banks of New York devoted so much of their loanable funds to these stock loans, these call loans, that they could not afford to loan money for the purposes of commerce or for commercial purposes, for there was more profit in these stock-call loans.

It is instructive and interesting to look back and see what started the panic in New York. I mean the immediate spark that touched it off, so to speak. You saw the first symptoms early in March. There had been, as you all know, an excessive and undue speculation and inflation in copper stocks. The copper corner partially exploded in March, and copper stocks commenced to tumble, but after that things went on at a good gait until about the 19th of October last. Then what happened? There was a man by the name of Heinze, who was operating in copper stocks and who had control of the Mercantile National Bank of New York. Heinze had been a thorn in the side of the copper trust—so called the Amalgamated Copper Company. He had fought them for years in the State of Montana. Finally he shifted his operations to New York and the battle went on. The Amalgamated Copper Company and all its allies went for poor Heinze.

I have no doubt that all they aimed at at the time was to crush him out. But unfortunately in crushing Mr. Heinze, in breaking his copper corner, they ignited the panic which began in October last and started a run on Mr. Heinze's bank, and from there the run extended to the Knickerbocker Trust Company, to the Lincoln Trust Company, to the Trust Company of America, and to other trust companies and banks in New York until within a week upward of $200,000,000 of money was taken from the banks and trust companies in New York City alone and hoarded.

What was the result? It will not do for the bankers of New York to say that it was the urgent demand for currency to move the crops that started the panic. The spark that ignited the panic grew out of that attempt—a successful attempt—to break the Heinze copper corner. It started the run on his bank and the other banks, and what made currency scarce, what brought on the panic, was the run of depositors, which in the space of a week drew over $200,000,000 out of the banks and trust companies of New York.

How was that panic met? It was met in a limited way and to a limited extent in three ways. From the 19th of October, the day the panic started with Heinze's bank, down to the 7th day of December, there were deposits of $58,000,000 of public funds in the banks. Under the system of Government deposits, which we have had for years, and with a large surplus of Government money in the Treasury and at the service of the banks, this surplus has served as an emergency currency.

It has been in the nature of emergency currency available to banks every fall, and on this occasion, from the 19th of October, the day the panic broke out, until the 7th day of December, that vacuum was attempted to be supplied as follows: There were $58,000,000 of Government deposits made in the entire country, of which New York City got about $40,000,000, and of that $40,000,000 over half went to two banks, the City Bank and the First National. Out of the $58,000,000 deposited by the Treasury during the acute period of the panic, from October 19 to December 7, $40,000,000 in round numbers went to the banks of New York City, and over half of that amount went to the two strongest and biggest banks in that city.

The vacuum was further supplied by the importation of gold. The bankers claim a great deal of credit for that, as though they had bought the gold and imported it here. As a matter of fact, those importations of gold—I have here a letter from the vice-president of the City National Bank of New York City, Mr. Vanderlip, once Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, which shows it—were brought to this country upon bills of lading for wheat and cotton, the products of our farms, and all the tangible and substantial increase we have had in our currency since the panic outside of the credit currency of national-bank notes has been the hundred millions or more of gold brought here by the cotton of the Southern farmer and the wheat of the Western farmer.

I was curious to know, and so I wrote Mr. Vanderlip:

Did you obtain that gold by borrowing it over there? Did you obtain it by selling American securities?

He said:

Nothing of the kind. We obtained it on bills of lading of American farm products—chiefly cotton and wheat.

A hundred millions came in in that way, and during that acute period to which I refer we increased our national-bank-note circulation to the extent of about $50,000,000, in round numbers. This, then, is what was done to supply the vacuum caused by the run and withdrawals of depositors—$58,000,000 of Government deposits, $100,000,000 of gold imported, and $50,000,000 of additional bank notes. But during this acute period, from October 19 to December 7, more than twice this amount had been withdrawn by depositors from the banks and trust companies.

But, Senators, did that stop the panic, the run, and withdrawal? By no means. The chairman of the Committee on Finance called attention the other day to the issuance of about $190,000,000, or perhaps it was only $150,000,000, of clearing-house certificates and about $75,000,000 of checks and other credit paper. Did that stop the panic? Did the $58,000,000 of Government deposits stop it? Did the $100,000,000 of gold imported stop it? Did the additional bank-note currency issued stop it? Did the clearing-house certificates stop it? Nothing of the kind. What stopped the panic, run, and withdrawal?

The only way the bankers stopped the panic was by breaking the law, by suspending payment, holding up the entire country. That is the modern way of stopping a panic, and it is an easy way of stopping it, if people submit to it. If the First National Bank of Alexandria, my own home, had suspended during that panic and refused to pay, as it did not do, the Comptroller of the Currency would have been swift to have put it in the hands of a receiver and wound it up. But when these great city banks all in a body resorted to this system, and held up their depositors in the manner they did, no action was taken. Senators, you can see that that system of stopping a panic was very effective, but it is the most lawless and revolutionary method of stopping a panic I have ever known.

It comes with poor grace from these big bankers to say to the American people, "You must not provide a fund for the protection of depositors; that is putting us big, strong banks on a footing of equality with the smaller and inferior banks. We big banks do not need it. Our reputation is so good that we do not need it. You will be putting a premium on poor bankers—we are so good it is not needed for us. You are putting those little inferior banks on our level." Great God! the recent panic demonstrated that the big banks were on a lower level than the small country banks. The big city banks were the originators and promoters of the hold-up and tie-up of deposits and reserves.

In my State most of the small country banks kept open shop during the panic and paid in cash all demands made upon them. It was the big banks, these banks which are now getting up on a high horse and saying "You do not want to do anything to protect the depositors," which exhibited the greatest amount of lawlessness in this case.

I am surprised—and I say it with respect, because I have the utmost respect for the chairman of the Finance Committee—that while in his very able speech he deplored the fact that the banks had acted in such a lawless manner, holding up everybody, their depositors, and the banks for which they acted as reserve agents, yet there is no provision in this bill nor do I know that he proposes any legislation to remedy a condition of that kind to prevent a tie-up of deposits and reserves in the future.

The Senator from Texas referred to another evil, not an evil in our currency system, but an evil in our banking system. Always remember, Senators, that under the national banking law our national banks perform a double function, as I said at the outset, as banks of issue and as banks of commerce or of discounts and deposit. Under our vicious system of bank reserves more injury resulted to the country in the recent panic than from any other source.

Let me explain it to you. Under our present system we have in the country three cities known as "central reserve cities," the cities of New York, Chicago, and St. Louis. Then we have in addition to that about forty reserve cities. The chairman of the Finance Committee will correct me if I have not given the right number, but I think we have about forty that are known as "reserve cities," and all the other national banks outside of the central reserve cities and outside of the reserve cities are commonly known as "country banks."

Under this system of bank reserves (and it is a kind of a lock-stitch system), the country banks are required to keep 15 per cent of their deposits as a reserve for the protection of their depositors, but of that 15 per cent they can deposit three-fifths with the banks in the reserve cities or in the central reserve cities, or in both. Then, in addition to that, from that 15 per cent is deducted the 5 per cent redemption fund on the amount of their circulation. From this you will see that a country bank depositing three-fifths of its reserves with banks in reserve cities has practically on hand in its own vaults, available for depositors, less than 6 per cent of its deposits; and this, you can see, is a most serious matter for the country bank when its three-fifths of reserves is tied up in a reserve bank that refuses to pay and temporarily suspends, as was the case in the recent panic.

Then, again, the banks in the forty reserve cities are required to keep a reserve of 25 per cent of their deposits, but they can deposit one-half of that in the banks of the central reserve cities, and from the other half is deducted the 5 per cent in the Treasury Department for the redemption of their notes. So that you see that these banks can have less than 12 per cent of the required reserve in their own vaults.

The unfortunate condition in the recent panic, and which wrought such extensive havoc throughout the country, was this system of bank reserves that I have described. The banks of New York, Chicago, and all the reserve cities held the reserve funds of the country banks, and in many instances they held a good deal more. Many banks had greater amounts of deposits than the amount required for the reserve. The banks in New York suspended and tied up in the recent panic about October 28. It was on the 19th of October that the panic broke out. On Saturday evening, the 26th of October, the banks met and decided to close up on the following Monday, and it is said that some of them kept open until noon, in order that their relatives, their cousins, and aunts could withdraw their deposits until that time.

At any rate, on the following Monday they suspended, closed up, and tied up, and the worst of it was they not only tied up the money of their local depositors in New York City—the rest of the country could have stood that—but they tied up all the reserves and other deposits which they held of the outside national banks, the deposits of all the national banks throughout the country. They not only tied that up, but they tied up the funds of the trust companies and State banks which were not reserves.

When the banks of New York tied up and suspended they forced the banks in Chicago which were in a good condition to suspend and tie up. Then the banks in St. Louis tied up and suspended, and then by and by most of the banks in the reserve cities suspended and tied up. The result was that the country banks were unable to obtain their reserves—their own moneys from the banks in the reserve cities—and this led to the temporary embargo on the movement of the crops. It was emphatically a panic of the banks, and when they suspended and tied up they had more currency on hand than they had in October, 1906.

As the Senator from Texas pointed out, and I am inclined on that point to agree with him, the bulk of the money the Treasury Department dumped into a few of the leading banks in New York City between the 19th of October and the 7th of December went into stock-exchange call loans.

In this connection I want to call your attention to those call loans. They are considered in ordinary times to be safe loans. They are based upon stock collaterals on a margin of 20 per cent, I believe. But while under ordinary conditions those loans may be safe and are easily collectible, yet in the case of a panic, a general suspension, and tie-up as they had in New York, what do those call loans amount to? A poor fellow borrowed $50,000 in a bank on a call loan and put up good stocks as collateral. The bank says, "I want you to pay that loan." The poor fellow rushed around to get the money. The banks have suspended and tied up, and he can not get the money anywhere, for it is all under lock and key. So his stock is put on the market on the stock exchange and sold at a sacrifice, and the brokers of the banks thus pressing collection buy in the stock for their principals, no doubt in many instances at greatly reduced rates. It is such practices, under such conditions, that causes the great tumble and depression in stocks.

In the case of a panic, where men can not get money to protect themselves, of what advantage is this matter of call loans? Incidentally, some strange things happened in that panic. Before I forget it I want to refer to one episode. We heard much of how certain great financiers rushed to the relief of the country in the panic. I remember one instance, and a very curious instance.

It appears that in the midst of the panic it was found that certain banks and trust companies carried stock of the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company. They had made loans on it. Those institutions in some way were pressed; they were badly crowded and they held that stock.

I remember reading in the papers at the time that there was a meeting in the house of a prominent banker in New York, an all-night meeting, in which the question was up of relieving the monetary stringency, and it was said that at that meeting plans were adopted that would relieve the acuteness of the tension and stringency. But what was the result of that all-night meeting? The result of it was this. The next morning the people who held the stocks of the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company were given the blessed privilege of exchanging it for the 5 per cent bonds of the steel trust.

In other words, the steel trust was to relieve the financial stringency by exchanging its 5 per cent bonds for the stock of the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company, and in that way the steel trust succeeded in absorbing its only rival and competitor of any consequence. No cash passed in the transaction, and yet it was supposed to relieve the currency famine.

If they had taken that stock and paid cash for it, I can see how they might have helped the poor banks that held the stock and given them a supply of cash. They compelled the banks to exchange that stock and take the bonds of the steel trust, the 5 per cent bonds; and of course those bonds could only bring cash to the parties who thus obtained them by a sale on the New York Stock Exchange. That was the way the financial stringency was relieved in that instance. I remember reading about that incident. I was here in the city at the time. I remember that a couple of gentlemen connected with the steel trust came down here from New York at that time to bushwhack around and ascertain whether that merger would stand and would be let alone.

I think they went away satisfied. I refer to this as an incident showing how the financial stringency was relieved on this occasion, and how much credit certain men assumed for relieving the financial stringency in that way.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. I only wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that the steel trust was in an excellent position to have relieved the stringency in currency, as their statements show that they had on hand many, many millions of dollars of cash.

Mr. NELSON. I think, undoubtedly, the Senator is correct. But I must hurry along, as I am taking up more of the time of the Senate than I intended.

I referred to this incident as an illustration of how some of those men succeeded in accomplishing what they could not have accomplished in ordinary "piping times of peace."

I want to impress upon your minds, fellow-Senators, the fact, and you must bear it in mind, that the recent panic was stopped not by the Government deposits, not by the importation of $100,000,000 of gold, not by the additional bank-note circulation; it was simply stopped—and no one could tell the limits of it if it had not been so stopped—by the banks suspending, tying up, and refusing to pay their depositors and the reserves and deposits of the banks throughout the country.

I have called the attention of Senators to our vicious system of bank reserves, which I have outlined to you. Unless the law is changed it will always, in case of panic, lead us to endless trouble, as in the recent panic. It leads to endless trouble in several ways.

In the first place, the country banks will, under this system, send their money—and they are encouraged to send it—to the financial centers, to New York City, for the mere bagatelle of getting 2 per cent interest. And at certain seasons of the year, owing to that reserve system, the banks in the central reserve cities, particularly in New York, are flooded with money, they are glutted with money; and when the money market becomes glutted they are anxious to make some use of it, and they put out the money on these call loans—use it to float stocks and bonds on the stock exchange, leading to great and undue speculation.

In times of normal conditions—I mean in times when there is no panic or financial stringency, in times of confidence, in times when there is no run on the banks—those loans made on stock collaterals may be all right, but not in times of panic. Many have complained of the recent panic that it reduced the value of stocks. Forced sales, with all currency tied up by the banks, necessarily had a depressing effect. Besides, for several years they had been busy in one way or another in inflating all kinds of stocks. Stocks that were paying a dividend of 5, 6, 7, and 8 per cent on their par value had been inflated to such an extent that they yielded the investors only from 3 to 4 per cent; and when good commercial loans went begging at 6 and 7 per cent, it stands to reason that such stocks as an investment ought not, under such conditions, to be much above par. Why should we expect a 7 per cent stock to be from 150 to 200 when first-class commercial loans were 6 and 7 per cent, and even higher?

It is furthermore to be observed that the stock market has become depressed and suspected, from the fact that great additions have been made to the stocks of enterprises that had previously been stocked for their full value. This has been so in the case of some railroads and industrial enterprises. By the injection of such additional stocks the liability of the corporations has been greatly increased. In the midst of prosperous times it had come to be the fashion among some of the great railroad companies of the country and among some of the great industrial enterprises, if their profits were large—as they have been in recent years—after paying all fixed charges and interest and paying a good big dividend on their stock, instead of devoting the surplus to additional equipment, to betterments, to improvements, to improving their tracks, to securing more rolling stock and more motive power and all kinds of improvement, they would do what they usually call in slang phrase "cut a melon"—distribute the extra surplus in some way to their stockholders, by the issue of new stock, and thus all the time increasing their stock liability in order to cover up the excessive earnings. In other words, they would endeavor to capitalize such extra surplus earnings.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from Minnesota shall have finished his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have derived two lessons from the recent panic. One is, first of all, and I shall offer an amendment to that effect, to repeal the law relating to our vicious system of bank reserves. Allow the banks to deposit their money wherever they will, but not allow such deposits to be credited upon the required reserve fund which they are to hold for the protection of their depositors. The recent panic demonstrated beyond any peradventure, and beyond any doubt—there can be no question about it—that the greatest evil that befell the banks in the interior of the country—the country banks—was the fact that their reserves were tied up and were not available.

In the State of Minnesota, prior to the suspension and tie-up in New York, we had been moving all our crops with western money; and we had a splendid crop, too, and prices were high. Our country banks were well supplied with currency, and they were devoting that currency to the movement of our crops and to commercial purposes, for be it known that our country banks in the West do not have any of these call loans on stock collaterals. It was not until the panic started in New York and until the banks of New York and Chicago tied up over $30,000,000 of the funds of our national banks in Minnesota that our banks in the Twin Cities were forced to follow suit.

The panic started as a panic of depositors on the 19th of October, but it proved in the end to be a panic of the banks. The banks in the reserve cities were more panic-stricken than even the depositors. During the entire period of the panic they were hoarding all the money they could lay their hands on.

To my mind, in addition to repealing the law relating to reserves, to which I have called your attention, I think we ought to do something to protect our depositors. To my mind, as a matter of principle, there is no distinction between a bill holder and a depositor. Both are creditors of the bank. A bill holder is a creditor of the bank. We secure that liability, we protect that creditor of the bank, but the other creditors, who outnumber the note holders many times, we leave in the lurch wholly unprotected.

I have introduced an amendment which proposes to set aside one-third of the taxes that national banks are required to pay under existing law, under the emergency currency provided for in this bill, if it shall become a law.

I have heard some men say, "What right have you to take the money of the banks or taxes paid the Government and use it for such purposes?" The way I look at the case is this: That the right to become incorporated to do business as a national bank is not a constitutional right or privilege that a citizen can claim. The Government could refuse to incorporate banks, and none of us could say we were deprived of any constitutional right thereby. But when the Government equips individuals with the power to become an artificial being—a corporation—and gives them not only the power to issue notes, but to carry on a general banking business as banks of deposit and discount, the Government has a right to prescribe the conditions under which we shall carry on that business under such corporate powers. The Government has the right to say, under such circumstances, not only that the bill holders shall be protected, but also that the depositors shall receive protection.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Minnesota yield to the junior Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I call the Senator's attention to whatever force there may be in that point that it can not be applied to the Senator's amendment because, as I understand it, the Senator proposes to take the taxes already paid.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. If so, any question as to what we could do with the banks' money has no earthly application to that amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I have heard the point made by some Senators that because this money has been paid by the banks into the general fund of the Treasury, therefore it is sacred and should not be devoted to such purpose. I am aware that this is an innovation. But reforms are often inaugurated to meet new evils and immediate and crying exigencies. It is the boast of the common law that for every wrong or injury there is or should be a remedy. When we establish a system of banks and equip them with such powers that they can not only do much good, but also some harm; when we allow them to be labeled "national banks," and thus hold them out to depositors as quasi-Government institutions, under which they attract depositors and secure their funds, it is our duty to see that those depositors suffer no harm. While good and sharp business men are able, as a rule, though not always, to discriminate between banks, the ordinary depositor—the plain, common man—is not possessed of such discriminating power. To him all "national banks" are good because they are Government institutions and are labeled such. He can not tell whether the banks make proper use of their deposits, and it is these common, plain people that are entitled to our care and protection.

The proposed amendment does not guarantee deposits; it simply provides a fund for their relief and protection out of which their losses may be paid.

In our own early banking history in this country Vermont, New York, and perhaps some other States had a so-called "guaranty fund." I do not recall the situation in respect to Vermont, but in respect to New York the difficulty was that the fund intended to protect depositors was in part diverted to other purposes and proved a failure, not because of the principle involved, but because of the poor administration. Besides, our banking systems in those days were, many of them, crude, and proved in many instances failures and entailed no end of losses.

We refer oftentimes to the great banks of the Old World, the Bank of France and the Bank of Germany and the Bank of England. I desire to call your attention to the fact that those great national banks are in the main banks of issue. As to commercial transactions, their business of discount and deposit is quite limited. Take the Bank of France, its discount and deposit account does not equal the account of a fourth-rate bank in the city of Chicago, where my friend, the Senator from Illinois, is from.

So with the Bank of Germany, and so even with the Bank of England. Most of the deposit and discount business is done by other banks than these great banks of issue; they confine themselves mainly to that. The Bank of England makes a considerable amount of loans, but its loans are mainly on what they call bills of exchange, issued against bills of lading for various products or articles of commerce—purely commercial transactions. Call loans on stock collaterals are practically unknown to these banks. The record of our national banks in the past, as disclosed by the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, shows that the ultimate losses to depositors has been quite limited. It is not so much the volume of the losses as the delay incident to the winding up of insolvent banks that has proved so harmful and discouraging to depositors. On page 23 of the Comptroller's last annual report it appears that during the forty-three years of the existence of our national banking system the total loss to the depositors has not exceeded over five one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

The last panic is no criterion of the amount required to pay depositors. If depositors feel confident, if depositors can be made to feel as safe about their deposits as the bill holders of the banks feel in respect to the bills, they will not only deposit their money in the banks, but they will let it remain there, and will cease to make such panicky runs, withdrawals, and hoardings as in the recent and all similar panics.

The circulation of our national banks at the present time is $690,000,000. Of this, $672,000,000 in round numbers is based upon 2 per cent bonds, paying a tax of one-half of 1 per cent a year, and $18,000,000 is based upon the higher class of bonds, paying a tax of 1 per cent a year.

On the basis of our present circulation now outstanding, the total amount of taxes outside of the emergency tax prescribed by this bill would be $3,540,000 a year. One-third of this would be $1,180,000 a year. My amendment provides that one-third of these taxes, or $1,180,000, shall be set aside as a fund for the protection of the depositors, and shall be allowed to accumulate to the extent of $20,000,000 and no more.

All sums in excess of this shall be covered into the general funds of the Treasury. When a bank fails depositors are to be paid in the first instance out of this fund, and the Government recoup from the assets of the bank whatever would be coming to the depositors if their claims had not been paid from this fund.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me the Senator might well say in connection with his statement that he has removed the cause for bank failures when he has guaranteed the deposits.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. As most of the losses are on account of runs upon the bank, necessarily if you remove the cause for the run you will remove the losses that would naturally accrue; and it perhaps would not cover one-tenth of the sum that the Senator has mentioned.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. I have been very much interested in his speech. Does the Senator by his amendment propose to have the Government guarantee the deposits, to set aside a fund for that purpose?

Mr. NELSON. No; my amendment merely provides a fund from which the losses of depositors are paid. I will read the amendment and you can see:

> That one-third of all taxes to be paid by national banking associations upon the average amount of their notes in circulation, pursuant to the provisions of section 4 of this act, including the taxes due and payable in the month of January, A. D. 1908, shall be, and hereby is, set apart in the Treasury of the United States as a permanent special fund, termed "Depositors' fund," to be used and expended in paying all depositors, except the United States—

I except them because they are otherwise protected. The Government is protected by the bonds deposited—> the amount of their deposits in any such association that has become insolvent, and for which a receiver has been appointed; and whenever any such association has become insolvent and a receiver has been appointed therefor by the Comptroller of the Currency, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, as soon as practicable, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, pay all depositors of such association, except the United States, the amount of their then subsisting deposits out of and from the said special fund; and after making such payment the United States shall, as to such deposits, be subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the depositors, and shall be entitled to recover and receive from the assets of such association all dividends and sums which the depositors would be entitled to if not paid from said special fund as aforesaid, and the amount so recovered and received shall be placed to the credit of and be a part of said special fund. Said special depositors' fund shall not be allowed to exceed the sum of $20,000,000, and all sums in excess of that amount shall be covered into the general funds of the Treasury.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota whether he contemplates that this depositors' guaranty fund should be invested in any way?

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is it to be kept in cash in the Treasury?

Mr. NELSON. I would leave it in about the shape that the Government deposits are now. The Senator knows that we have nearly $250,000,000 of Government deposits that are lying around in the banks, bringing us no income at all; and while that is the case we need not worry about this small fund of $20,000,000, which is to be for the protection of depositors.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator whether it would not be advisable to provide for the investment of that fund, so that it might increase by accretions of interest, and thus constitute a further guaranty to depositors, instead of allowing it to remain idle?

Mr. NELSON. That might be very likely, and I should certainly have no objection to it; but that does not reach the main question.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. DIXON. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota what would be the objection to letting the national banks, which now hold $250,000,000 of Government deposits, pay 2 per cent on those deposits, and make that a fund to guarantee deposits?

Mr. NELSON. If my friend, the Senator from Montana, had been here at the last session of Congress, I know he would not have asked me that question.

Mr. DIXON. No; I would not have asked the Senator that personally.

Mr. NELSON. No. As Senators who are here now know, I made a desperate effort to get a provision in the financial bill which we passed at the last Congress for the payment of a small rate of interest—I think 2 per cent—on such deposits, but the financial men of the Senate—I am only a granger, you must remember, only a plain farmer from Minnesota—the financial men of the Senate thought I was mistaken and thought that the banks ought to keep this money without paying any interest upon it.

But with reference to this matter, in connection with what the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has suggested, I will say that we need not have any great scruples about the interest on this $20,000,000 fund for the protection of depositors so long as we have no scruples about getting interest on the $250,000,000 Government deposits which the banks have been using as an emergency currency.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether he does not think that public sentiment and the sentiment of the Senate has been sufficiently enlightened upon that subject to insure the success of his amendment regarding interest upon these deposits if it should be again offered?

Mr. NELSON. Do not ask me any questions on that subject and I will tell you no fibs. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, before I close I will offer this amendment and ask to have it printed and lie on the table. It is an amendment repealing the two sections of the Revised Statutes relating to reserve deposits; that is, that portion of their reserves which the banks may deposit in other banks and receive credit for as though in their own vaults.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the amendment may be read, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 10. That sections 5192 and 5195 of the Revised Statutes as heretofore amended are hereby repealed.

Mr. NELSON. To my mind, Mr. President, there are two important remedies urgently called for to meet and cure the evils disclosed and from which we suffered in the recent panic; one evil arising from bad provisions of existing laws and the other evil for lack of any law covering the subject. One remedy is to protect the depositors, and the other is to remove the embargo as to bank reserves. I call it "embargo," for such it proved to be in the recent panic. I think it must be patent to every Senator who has kept track of the recent panic how unfortunately that system of bank reserves worked; how the tie-up in New York led to the tie-up in the large banks of the reserve cities throughout the country; how it hampered the commerce and the trade of the country, and how it affected especially the farmers of the South in handling their cotton and the farmers of the Northwest in moving their grain crops. There was as much currency in the big banks in October, 1907, as in October, 1906. The difference was that in 1907 the big banks had it tied up. In other words, we suffered from a bankers' panic.

If the Senate will kindly bear with me, I want to say a few words in reference to the pending bill. To my mind this legislation will not relieve the financial difficulty in cases like the recent panic. If the banks of New York had had the power to issue such a currency as that provided for in this bill they could not have stopped the runs and withdrawals that occurred and were impending in the recent panic; they could only have stopped it in the way they did stop it—by suspending. More than that, this currency—I do not want to use any harsh terms, but I can not help calling it "stock-exchange currency"—this currency has to pay a tax of 6 per cent. The banks that loan out that currency will naturally want to get some interest on it—at least 6 per cent—and that will make it a 12 per cent currency. That kind of a currency, on account of the high rate of interest, will not be used for ordinary commercial loans; ordinary business can not afford to pay that rate. It will be only a currency that will be used and available to fill a gap in stock speculation in the New York Stock Exchange.

More than that, when it is known that a bank has to resort to the issue of such emergency currency, that of itself will be sufficient to cast suspicion and distrust upon the bank that has to resort thereto and make depositors look upon it with suspicion and disfavor. In fact, will provoke a run.

You can all see, if you study the course of the recent panic, that it began in a run on the banks, and that that run was not stopped either by the Government deposits, by the importation of gold, or by additional bank-note circulation, but it was stopped by a general and unlawful suspension on the part of the banks in the central reserve and reserve cities. The banks were tied up till long after these accretions had been made and received.

To my mind, instead of stopping panics by a general hold-up, as in the recent panic, the best way, the sound way, the rational way is to remove the cause of panics, to remove it by engendering confidence in the depositors, so that they will feel as safe about their deposits as they do about their bank bills.

What will be the result if Congress should adopt a provision to protect depositors in the mode suggested? The result will be that not only will depositors of national banks be protected, but the State banks will secure similar legislation from their respective States which will cover not only State banks, but loan and trust companies, which in the recent trouble disclosed much weakness. The greatest havoc in the recent panic in respect to banks was among the loan and trust companies. We can not reach them directly; we can not compel the States to make their loan and trust companies keep as big a reserve as the national banks.

But if we protect depositors in our national banks, State banks and loan and trust companies will for their own protection have to adopt a similar policy, and they will be swift to secure the necessary legislation therefor.

I have some figures here, furnished me by Dun & Co., mercantile reporters, showing the number of banks, State and national, and loan and trust companies that have gone into insolvency, the amount of their capital and surplus, and the amount of their deposits. This list covers the period from the inception and outbreak of the panic in October down to near the end of December. The following are the totals of this list:

List of savings banks that have closed and suspended since the panic began, October 19, 1907.

	Capital.	Surplus.	Deposits.	Number of each class.

We need have no scruples about protecting the depositors of national banks by such proposed legislation. If we do that, it will lead indirectly, and in the way I have pointed out, to the adoption of similar legislation by the various States—such a law, for example, as has recently been adopted in Oklahoma.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly, if the Senator will let me make one statement first. It is a curious thing to note—and I call attention to it—that as soon as the State of Oklahoma adopted a law to protect the depositors of its State banks, the national banks of that State applied to the Comptroller of the Currency for leave to participate with the State banks of Oklahoma in providing a fund to protect their depositors. I may say, incidentally, that I have in my committee room upstairs scores of letters from bankers and from business men throughout the country, all favoring this plan of protecting depositors. It may seem an innovation to some of you, but I am satisfied that if we can protect depositors by a fund created in this way, and then repeal the law as to bank reserves, we shall have solved the chief financial difficulties that afflicted us so sadly in the recent panic, and there will be no occasion for any emergency currency. Just think of it, to-day we have over $35.61 per capita in circulation among the people in this country, a greater amount than any other country except France, and there the system of liquidation by transfer of credits does not prevail, as in this country, and hence more cash is required. The following table shows the amount of money in circulation each month from the 1st of July to the 1st of the following January in the years ending January 1, 1907, and January 1, 1908:

Circulation.

Date	Amount in circulation.	Per capita.
July 1, 1906	$2,736,646,628	$32.32
July 1, 1907	2,914,342,256	33.86
August 1, 1906	2,757,349,438	32.52
August 1, 1907	2,781,323,500	32.27
September 1, 1906	2,766,913,299	32.59
September 1, 1907	2,789,201,620	32.32
October 1, 1906	2,812,133,694	33.08
October 1, 1907	2,805,854,374	32.46
November 1, 1906	2,836,882,786	33.68
November 1, 1907	2,876,368,696	33.24
December 1, 1906	2,869,074,255	33.66
December 1, 1907	3,008,241,583	34.71
January 1, 1907	2,883,900,328	33.78
January 1, 1908	3,078,989,298	35.48

If we can keep this money in circulation we have an abundance, and by protecting depositors the money will be kept in use and not hoarded.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator, and this seems the opportune moment. I understood the Senator to say that if we provide for increasing the security of national-bank depositors by legislation regarding the reserves and also increasing their security by means of a guaranty fund, this action would be persuasive in securing similar legislation on the part of the States regarding State banks. I also understood the Senator to say that this is the only way by which Congress can control the action of the State banks. I wish to ask the Senator whether he does not think that under the interstate-commerce power of the Constitution it will be as competent for Congress to pass regulations and restrictions regarding State banks engaged in interstate commerce as it is unquestionably competent for Congress to provide regulations and restrictions regarding State railroads engaged in interstate commerce?

I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that interstate commerce, so far as transportation is concerned, consists in the carriage of goods sold from the home of the seller to the place of business of the buyer in another State, and that interstate exchange consists in the transfer of the value of those goods from the buyer in one State to the seller in the other. If these are both branches of interstate commerce, one complementing the other, one accomplishing a physical transfer of the goods from one State to another, and the other accomplishing the transfer of the value from one State to another, why is it not equally competent for Congress to provide regulations and restrictions in the interest of interstate commerce that will make the State banks that are acting as the instrumentalities of the nation so conduct interstate commerce as to secure those engaged in it?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the premises of the question propounded by the Senator from Nevada are so extensive and comprehensive and cover so much ground that I am not prepared to admit the validity of those premises in all their length and breadth; and on that account I am hardly in a position to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, without argument upon the matter—for I do not wish to divert the Senator from his discussion—I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the question, and I hope he will reflect upon it, as to whether it is not within our power not only to persuade, but to coerce State corporations engaged in interstate commerce, whatever the form of that commerce may be, whether it consists simply of transportation of or exchange.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that I am always in favor of using moral suasion instead of drastic legislation. If we enact a provision in our national-bank laws protecting depositors, it will operate as a moral suasion on the different State legislatures, and the State banks and the trust companies will go to their respective State legislatures and say, "For God's sake save us against these national banks; they are getting all our deposits; they protect their depositors, and we have no chance; you have got to give us a similar law." That is the way it will work, and that is the way it will be. Even if the Senator is right in his premises, there is no occasion to resort to such drastic legislation.

Now, Mr. President, in connection with this matter, and before I sit down, I want to read a statement on this subject of Government deposits by ex-Secretary Gage, for many years president of the First National Bank of Chicago, one of the greatest banks in that city. I read from a hearing before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives. Here is what ex-Secretary Gage said:

The stumbling-block—

Speaking about one provision of the Fowler bill, so called—

The stumbling-block in the bill to most everybody, at first blush, is the guaranty of deposits. It stumbled me. I fell right down over that. I said never, never; no; that will not do. You are not going to make a black man as good as a white man by just washing him. But I reflected on this. I studied this bill, and I am persuaded that it is just, equitable, wise, and right that the creditors of the banks which come under the provisions of this bill will have their deposits guaranteed to them as will be the bank's circulating notes held by the general public. The nature of the obligation from the bank is exactly the same in principle, whether evidenced by a pass book or by the bank's notes in the form of circulating money. There is no difference in the principle.

And there is not, Mr. President. They are all debts of the bank. The note that the bank issues and the pass book or the certificate of deposit are both debts of the bank. Why should we segregate and protect one class, the less numerous class, and leave the other, the more numerous class, in the lurch, especially when, in order to maintain our currency in circulation, it is necessary to encourage the people to keep their money on deposit in the banks to the end that the latter may employ the same in commerce and trade; in other words, devote the same to commercial loans.

I said a moment ago, before the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] interrupted me, that we have at the present time $35.61 per capita in circulation—the greatest amount in all our history. In the panic of 1893 we only had $24 per capita. We have more money in circulation—that is, outside of the Treasury—in this country than any other country except France, and in that country they need more money and use more money than we do, because they do not resort to the system of transfer of credits as we do in this country. They liquidate most of their smaller transactions in cash, while we, for most purposes, in ordinary times, when there is no panic, use checks.

If we can keep this great volume of money in circulation and keep it in active use, so that the banks may lend it out for commercial purposes, we shall have an abundance of currency.

A word more, in conclusion, about this bill. The currency which it provides for will be a stock-exchange currency. It will not be a currency that will be useful for commercial loans, because, with the tax and the ordinary interest, it will be too costly and too high money.

In the next place, Mr. President, I think that when the fact becomes known to the public that a bank resorts to that kind of currency in a period of financial stringency it will engender distrust and make the people suspicious of the bank. Dubious as I am about this currency, I regard it far safer and superior to any so-called "asset currency." I am utterly opposed to an asset currency.

I am old enough, Mr. President, to have lived in this country and to have had experience under the asset-currency system that we had prior to the days of the great rebellion. Even the banks themselves, clamorous as some of them are for asset currency, when the question is brought home to their doors, as in the case of the recent panic, when it is a matter of issuing currency among themselves in the shape of clearing-house certificates, they are not content to issue such certificates on the general assets of the bank. They make all the members of the clearing-house association, no matter how intrinsically good they may be, put up securities for their share of the clearing-house certificates. If that is what they themselves feel it prudent and safe to do, why should they ask the public at large to do differently?

There is one thing, Mr. President, we can say about our national bank note currency. It may lack elasticity; it may be based on a wrong plan, but this much, Mr. President, can be said in favor of that currency, that not a single bill holder has ever lost a dollar.

Let us change the law, Mr. President, so as to avoid in the future the calamities we have had in the past; protect our depositors; stop runs on the banks, and prevent the big banks in the commercial centers of the country and the reserve cities from tying up the funds of the local banks. As I have said, I was a little surprised that, while the chairman of the committee criticised the banks for their attitude in the recent panic, he has made no provision in this bill to prevent the banks from suspending and tying up the currency in the future as they did in the recent panic.

REVISION OF THE PENAL LAWS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is an amendment on the table offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], which the committee desires should be accepted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, after line 3, it is proposed to insert as a new section, the following:

SEC. 124a. Every officer and employee of the United States and every person acting for or on behalf of the United States in any official capacity under or by virtue of the authority of any Department or office of the Government who shall, by virtue of the office or position held by him, become possessed of any information which might exert an influence upon or affect the market value of any product of the soil grown within the United States, which information is required by law or under the rules and practices of any Department of the Government to be withheld from publication until a fixed time, who shall willfully impart, either directly or indirectly, said information, or any part thereof, to any person not entitled under the law or rules and practices of the Department of the Government to receive same, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than ten years and may be fined in any sum not to exceed $10,000.

Section 124b——

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator from Texas desired only one section adopted. That is my understanding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT. Have all the amendments been agreed to?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. All the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. BURKETT. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I will call his attention to the amendment to section 185. I understood the Senator was going to ask to have it disagreed to. If he has not done that, I shall ask that it be voted on separately when we come to a vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. To what amendment does the Senator from Nebraska refer?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee on lines 14 and 15, page 95. The amendment was agreed to, but, if there be no objection, the Chair will regard it as open.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 95 of the bill, section 185, line 14, after the word "vessel," the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted:

To the current business of the carrier.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment was adopted as in Committee of the Whole and is printed in italics. It is a part of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was reported to the Senate and concurred in.

Mr. BURKETT. I had spoken to the chairman of the committee and he had said he would call attention to it when the bill came into the Senate, and have the amendment disagreed to in the Senate. I ask if he has done so? If he has not, I want a separate vote on it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire to oppose the amendment?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes, sir. I want to oppose the amendment. I opposed it in the Committee of the Whole, and the chairman of the committee will remember I spoke to him about it afterwards, and he suggested that it go over and come up in the Senate, and he would ask to have it rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was not reserved.

Mr. BURKETT. When was the amendment adopted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the 24th.

Mr. BURKETT. Then I ask, Mr. President, if it is in order, to make a motion to strike out those words.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to would call it up for further consideration.

Mr. BURKETT. I move that the vote by which the amendment was adopted be reconsidered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the motion will not prevail. The amendment was discussed at great length, extending over more than one session of the Senate, and was adopted after very full consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to make an informal inquiry of the Senator from Texas, whether or not the amendment which was adopted in his absence is the amendment as he desires it?

Mr. CULBERSON. I was endeavoring to find out.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope we may have the indulgence of the Senate for a moment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that the amendment which has been adopted is not exactly the one that I would be glad to see adopted. I offered it on the 16th of January. What I desire to propose is to add a new section, to be known as "119a," which I will send to the desk. But before it is read I will state that it has already been adopted in the other House as section 119a, and I understand there is no opposition to it here. Consequently I ask that it be adopted in lieu of the amendment adopted in my absence a few moments ago.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest to the Senator from Texas that perhaps we had better move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted a few moments ago.

Mr. CULBERSON. I accept that suggestion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest to the Senator from Texas that he withdraw the amendment which has been passed upon. The motion to reconsider was adopted, but the amendment is still before the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to add as a new section, to be known as 119a, what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, after line 14, insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 119a. Whoever, being an officer or employee of the United States or a person acting for or on behalf of the United States in any capacity under or by virtue of the authority of any Department or office thereof, and while holding such office, employment, or position shall, by virtue of the office, employment, or position held by him, become possessed of any information which might exert an influence upon or affect the market value of any product of the soil grown within the United States, which information is by law or by the rules of the Department or office required to be withheld from publication until a fixed time, and shall willfully impart, directly or indirectly, such information, or any part thereof, to any person not entitled under the law or the rules of the Department or office to receive the same; or shall, before such information is made public through regular official channels, directly or indirectly speculate in any such product respecting which he has thus become possessed of such information, by buying or selling the same in any quantity, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. ALDRICH. In order that it may be made the unfinished business, although it is not my purpose to press it to the exclusion of other things, but I think we ought to have some unfinished business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the bill be temporarily laid aside. That request is agreed to, in the absence of objection. The bill is temporarily laid aside.

EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF MAJ. GEN. JOHN STARK.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 44) for the erection of an equestrian statue of Maj. Gen. John Stark in the city of Manchester, N. H. A similar bill has passed the Senate three times in former Congresses.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $40,000 for the erection of an equestrian statue of Maj. Gen. John Stark within the limits of the city of Manchester, N. H.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINING TECHNOLOGY BRANCH IN GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, is before the Senate. The Secretary will state the first business on the Calendar.

The joint resolution (S. R. 35) to provide for a mining technology branch in the Geological Survey was announced as the first business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. I ask that the joint resolution go over under Rule IX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will go over under Rule IX.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that in the absence of the Senator in charge of the bill it simply be passed without prejudice.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to modifying my request to that extent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

The bill (S. 4030) to fix the pay of the Army was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the bill go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 28) to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports and to promote commerce" was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. I was about to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that I understood from him the other day that the bill would not be pressed at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that I secured unanimous consent yesterday to bring up the bill to-morrow after the routine morning business, so it may be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

ROAD TO NASHVILLE (TENN.) NATIONAL CEMETERY.

Mr. BULKELEY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 4454) authorizing the Secretary of War to accept for the Government the Gallatin turnpike, from the city of Nashville to the National Cemetery, in the county of Davidson, State of Tennessee.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of War to accept the donation by the county of Davidson, Tenn., of the Gallatin turnpike from the line of the corporation of Nashville, Tenn., to the entrance of the national cemetery, and to accept from the owners of the lands lying on both sides of the turnpike the donation of sufficient ground to make the roadway 75 feet in width. It authorizes him to construct upon the land a macadamized public highway. Twenty-five thousand dollars is appropriated for the construction of the boulevard.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PARK IN COEUR D'ALENE RESERVATION, IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 140) for the establishment of a park on the northern portion of the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation in Idaho.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MATERIAL AND EQUIPMENT FOR PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. FRYE. Is this proceeding under Rule VIII?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. FRYE. Then I ask that the joint resolution (S. R. 40) to provide for the transportation by sea of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal may be passed over without prejudice. I will call it up at an early day, for it is an important bill, but I want more Senators to be present when it is under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BELLAIRE, OHIO.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration of the bill (S. 156) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Bellaire, in the State of Ohio.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Bellaire, Ohio, the cost not to exceed $100,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1559) for the relief of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana $215,820.89 for a claim found due it by the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASES OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2429) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth H. Olcott.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act granting pension and increase of pension to certain soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain and other wars, and to the widows of such soldiers and sailors."

STATUE OF MAJ. GEN. NATHANAEL GREENE.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1761) for the erection of a statue of Maj. Gen. Nathanael Greene upon the Guilford battle ground, in North Carolina.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Library with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That a statue of Gen. Nathanael Greene shall be erected on the battlefield of Guilford Court House, in Guilford County, N. C.

SEC. 2. That to pay for the construction, erection, and completion of said statue, and the preparation of a site for the same, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. That the site for said statue, within the limits of said battlefield of Guilford Court House, shall be selected by the Secretary of War, but no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be expended until the site so selected shall be conveyed free of cost to the United States and there shall be provided for the public use an open highway.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VETERINARY SERVICE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 654) to increase the efficiency of the veterinary service of the Army.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. As I caught the reading of the bill it prohibits the appointment to one of these positions of a veterinary surgeon who is married.

Mr. WARREN. No; it is on taking in the new veterinary surgeons, the younger men. They must be single when they enter, just the same as enlisted Army men must be.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it true that in the other branches of the military service they refuse to allow a married man to be appointed, but they allow him to marry after he is appointed? That is a difference between "before and after" that I can not quite comprehend.

Mr. WARREN. With the commissioned officers the question of marriage is not raised. Veterinarians are not commissioned officers in one sense of the word; they are more like those who might be called "warrant officers." The Senator is probably familiar with the Army regulations which provide that enlisted men when entering shall be within a certain age and shall be single men.

Mr. BAILEY. As to the enlisted men——

Mr. WARREN. As to the future, that will take care of itself.

Mr. BAILEY. That is, as to the enlisted men, but there is no prohibition of that kind as to the officers.

Mr. WARREN. No; there is not; and Army veterinarians would not be, under this bill, in all terms and ways commissioned officers.

Mr. BAILEY. But you are making them officers under the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BAILEY. You are providing that they shall have the rank of first lieutenants.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon; there is not anything which gives them rank in the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish——

Mr. WARREN. I beg pardon; they have the allowances, but they do not have the rank.

Mr. BAILEY. Then that is an odd kind of legislation which gives a man all the privileges and allowances and denies him the rank. I am not perfectly sure myself that there is any necessity for increasing the allowances of these gentlemen to a certain rank unless it be true that their present compensation and allowance are insufficient. I believe the veterinary surgeon renders a very useful and a very important service in the cavalry branch of the military arm.

Mr. WARREN. And equally in the artillery.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; even more so, probably, in the artillery. It is important that the horses be kept in good condition, and in order that that may be done it is important that competent men shall be in charge of them.

I am more than willing to pay these men, as I am more than willing to pay every man who serves the Government, a fair compensation for his services, but I do object to the proposition here to take men who are not to be made officers and who are not enlisted men, within the proper term, because they are not fighting men and they perform a wholly different duty, and give them all the benefits of a retirement provision of law. If the veterinary surgeons are to be entitled to this retirement I should like to hear the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs give some good reason why the men who fight should not have the same privilege. If we begin the policy of providing for the retirement of men who are not officers, we must end by permitting the retirement of everybody in the military service.

For my part, I should love to repeal the law which retires the officers. I would make them do like every other man in this country must do—accept a fair pay for their service while they are serving the Government—and I would leave them to spend it or to save it, according to their own prudence, as the citizen who pays the taxes which are used to pay their salaries must do.

But of course I understand that we have no hope of repealing that law. When I first came to Congress I introduced a bill at every session to do it. I never could get a hearing on it. We have entered on that policy, and we shall probably not retrace our steps. Instead of repealing a bad law, we are going on making it worse, until within twenty years every man in the service of the United States, military or naval, will be entitled to the benefits of a law for his retirement, and that is to be followed in due course of time by another law pensioning and retiring everybody who performs a civil service for the United States. When we retire everybody who serves the Government I would like to know, then, who is going to provide for the people who support the Government? We will have more tax eaters in this country than we will have taxpayers if this proceeds much further.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as to the objection the Senator makes regarding marriage, I have no objection to an amendment. As to their having the rank, I think the Senator will see at once that if a man who has charge of the horses of a battery or regiment of artillery or cavalry happened to be at a post where there were only a few officers, and he should rank the others they would scarcely want the veterinarian to be the ranking officer of that post—to have charge of the post—when his education is entirely of a professional character and his attention is directed only to the matter of the health, life, and well-being of the horses.

As to the matter of general retirement of Army and Navy officers, Mr. President, we will not go into that. It is a large question. But here, in this bill, we undertake to get men who are neither enlisted men nor men who are required to know the art of war; but these men for veterinary service must educate themselves, and they must be graduates from some veterinary college before they can be considered. They must accomplish this at their own expense. Take the commissioned officers in the Army: They are educated at the expense of the Government. But here are certain professional men, who study their profession and prepare themselves in the best manner possible. After these men have paid for their own education and have graduated, we propose to enter them as second lieutenants, on the same pay that they now receive, as far as that part is concerned.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, the curriculum in the colleges where these men are educated is just as thorough and complete as in medical colleges at the present time. They have got to take a course of three or four years; they study anatomy, physiology, and all collateral branches in addition to their specialty. Necessarily they have to pay a large amount of money for their education. I have not looked into this bill, but I know that is the case at the present time.

Mr. BAILEY. I must not be understood as underrating the veterinary surgeon in the part he performs in our social economy. Having a great fondness for horses, I regard him as a very useful member of society. I happen to know by personal experience and personal contact with them that many of them are gentlemen of the very highest class. The old notion of the "horse doctor" has been long since exploded.

Mr. WARREN. Just a moment further. As it is now we have two classes of veterinarians. We have the old class, or what was left of them before the act was passed four or five years ago changing their status. These under the present law can receive but $75 a month. They could not pass a technical examination of the board if they were required to do it in an up-to-date civil-service understanding of astronomy, logorithms, and so on. But they are good veterinarians, and the Government seeks to retain them, and it can not retain that class of men upon the pay. It can not employ them at $1,500 a year—the present salary of regular veterinarians—because they can not pass the examination. It can not get enough new men at $1,500, who are graduates of the colleges, to stay in the service.

We have veterinarians who will stay in the service if their pay is increased, and who are competent, and it is proposed to take those old ones who are useful into the service and place them in the same rank with the others; then allow all, after ten years' service, to be first lieutenants, as far as pay and allowances are concerned. We can not keep them unless we do this, and we can not get others for the same pay.

The retirement is another feature. If a man serves his entire life from early manhood when he comes into service in the twenties to the age of 64 at a salary of $1,500 or even $1,600, I submit that in his few remaining years, and especially if the Senator would have him married, as I certainly would, it is little enough for the Government to furnish him to retire on three-fourths pay for the few remaining years of his life.

So far as the dollars and cents are concerned, I want to say it is a matter of much interest to the Government to have a good veterinarian. Men's lives may not cost much in a money way, and when enlisted men die it is only a matter of enlisting others. I am speaking of it as a matter of money alone. But at the present price of horseflesh, which the Senator from Texas well knows, it is a very expensive matter to have some tinkerer or so-called "horse doctor" instead of an educated veterinarian attend to five hundred to a thousand horses.

This bill proposes to take the men who are now outside as employees and put them in regular service. As to the new ones, they must be graduates of colleges, as the Senator from New Hampshire has said, and after a certain number of years at $1,500 they pass to the pay of a first lieutenant, $1,600; and when they reach the age of 64, they are retired.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming evidently thinks as Abraham Lincoln did, that the loss to the Government of a mule would be more to be deplored than the loss of a few brigadier-generals.

Mr. WARREN. I will not allow the Senator to leave it in that shape. I said as a matter of money alone the case is in favor of the mule, as the Senator mentions that, or rather the horse. But the Senator can not put words in my mouth and say I proposed that the loss of a mule would be more to be deplored than the loss of officers or enlisted men.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I will put words in my own mouth. If these men are not paid enough, I am willing to vote to raise their pay to anything that is reasonable, but for one I am not willing to start in upon the question of pensioning beyond the regular pension laws until we get ready to revise the whole subject. If it can not be met in any other way, I shall interpose an objection to further consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say that I do not expect to use up the time of the Senate if there is objection. The bill is one that has been repeatedly and continuously reported, not only from the War Department, but unanimously from the Committee on Military Affairs, who studied the question thoroughly.

Mr. CLAPP. I will not interpose the objection, but I may desire to have an opportunity of offering an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply want to say, Mr. President, that I do not believe the Government can obtain the service of competent men without paying them adequate salaries. I am perfectly willing, I say for the second time, not only to pay these gentlemen all their services are fairly worth, but I stand ready to apply the same rule to every other man in the service of the Government. I only insist that the Government shall treat its employees as all citizens treat their employees, pay them a fair value of their services while they are at work, and then leave them to dispose of it in their own way.

If you pay these men less than the fair value of their services, reserving something of it to be given to them when they quit work, thus assuming a kind of guardianship over grown men, this kind of an injustice will frequently result. A man serves until the year before he is to retire and dies. Then the whole accumulation which the Government has been reserving out of his salary against the time when he might be paid for doing nothing lapses, and another man whose salary was reserved upon a calculation of longevity, lives double the time the calculation supposed he would live, and he gets twice as much as the Government has kept out of his salary, while the wife and children of the man who died the year before retirement gets nothing at all of what the Government had kept, and of what in justice belongs to them.

I resent the idea that the men who serve the Government shall be treated as children, incompetent to take care of what they earn. I understand, of course, that this policy, inaugurated during the war as a temporary measure, has become the settled policy of the Government with respect to the Army and Navy and the judiciary.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator mean as to retirement?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator must know that that is the rule all over the world.

Mr. BAILEY. I know that that was never the rule in this country until the war between the States. If the Senator will take the trouble to examine the debates, he will find there was not a man who advocated that law who asserted that it was to become the permanent policy of the Government. The truth, and the whole truth, is that there were a number of venerable and excellent men long in the service of the United States who were not qualified for the great work that lay before them, and the Government, unwilling of its own motion to strip them of their command and deprive them of their offices, devised the system of retirement as an easy and graceful way for the seniors who were fit for peace to make room for the juniors who were needed in war. That was the whole argument in favor of it, and it was adopted by the American Congress with no thought that it should become the permanently established policy of the Government.

Mr. President, it is a curious kind of an argument to say that because a man has a lifetime employment assured to him the Government must take care of him after he ceases to be useful to the Government on account of his age. Nearly any other man in any employment in this world, if assured from his very early manhood of a lucrative and permanent position, would be entirely willing to inaugurate a policy of saving something each year to provide a modest competence for his old age. But in the case of the Government, and in those cases, too, where the tenure is the most secure and the salaries the largest, we adopt the policy of encouraging men to spend all they receive by promising to take care of them when they have spent all they have earned. It is an unwise and an indefensible policy.

A man comes to Congress and stays here twenty years. Very few of us are willing, while serving the people during the session, to go home and serve ourselves during the recess. Very few of us are willing to undertake the double drudgery of serving our constituents here and serving our clients when we are not required to be here. Per consequence, nearly all of the lawyers who come to Congress and serve fifteen or twenty years, at the expiration of their service and upon their voluntary or enforced retirement find their law practice gone. They find their clients with other professional advisers. They are absolutely without the means of a livelihood. Nobody proposes that they shall be pensioned. A man may stay here for forty years. He may unselfishly devote himself to the grave concerns of this people. He may—as a faithful public servant must do, yet except that out of his salary he saves a competence, there is nobody to provide for him in his declining years; and I would resist the law that made such a provision. I say that the Government ought to pay its Senators and Representatives, as it ought to pay every man who serves it down to the men who fight in the trenches, the full value of their services while they work, and when any man ceases to work for this people he ought to cease to draw a salary from the Public Treasury. I believe, sir, as I have said on a former occasion, that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and I also believe that the hire is worthy of the laborer.

Let us establish the sensible rule by the Government that the most sagacious men in business and industry establish over their own affairs. Let us only employ good men; let us pay them good wages for good work, and then if they are improvident enough to spend it, let them suffer the consequence. If the Senator from Wyoming thinks—and I am sure he does, and I agree with him in that opinion—that the Government can not secure the services of competent and educated men in this day for the same salary commanded by the old-time "horse doctor," let us raise the salary, but do not let us put a premium upon extravagance by advising the spendthrifts that they can waste their wages because the Government intends to support them when they quit working.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HURON, S. DAK.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 418) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Huron, in the State of South Dakota.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "ten," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of a United States post-office, land office, United States weather bureau, and other Government offices, in the city of Huron and State of South Dakota, the cost of said site, and building, including said vaults, heating, and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $110,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOUNDARY LINE OF ROCK CREEK PARK.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3001) to rectify the boundary line of Rock Creek Park.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Whereas all the tracts and parcels of land lying between Sixteenth street extended and Rock Creek, from Blagden Mill road to the District line, were one time included in the map of Rock Creek Park and were condemned for the purposes of said park; and

Whereas certain tracts were omitted from said park because of insufficiency of funds to pay for same: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to rectify the boundary line of the east side of Rock Creek Park, in the District of Columbia, all the various small tracts and parcels of land lying between Sixteenth street extended NW., Blagden Mill road, Rock Creek Park, and the north line of the Shepherd subdivision shall be secured as hereinafter set out and shall become a part of Rock Creek Park.

SEC. 2. That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, hereinafter referred to as the board of control of Rock Creek Park, shall cause to be made an accurate map of said parcels, showing the location, quantity, and character of each parcel of private property to be taken, which map shall be filed and recorded in the public records of the District of Columbia; and from and after the date of filing said map the several tracts and parcels of land shown thereon shall be held as condemned for public uses and the title thereof vested in the United States, subject to the payment of just compensation, to be determined by said board of control of Rock Creek Park and approved by the President of the United States: Provided, That such compensation be accepted by the owner or owners of the several parcels of land.

SEC. 3. That if the said board of control shall be unable by agreement with the respective owners to purchase all of the land so selected and condemned within thirty days after such condemnation, at the price approved by the President of the United States, it shall, at the expiration of such period of thirty days, make application to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, by petition, for an appraisement of the value of such land as it has been unable to purchase, the proceedings of appraisement and condemnation to be under and in accordance with sections 483 to 491, inclusive, of the Revised Code of Law for the District of Columbia, so far as the same are applicable.

SEC. 4. That to pay the expenses of inquiry, survey, assessment, cost of lands taken, and all other necessary expenses incidental thereto, the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That one-half of said sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be expended, shall be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, in four equal annual installments, with interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum upon the deferred payments.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have the preamble to the bill again read, Mr. President. A phrase in it struck me as being very peculiar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The preamble will be again read.

The Secretary again read the preamble.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Montana that he move to strike out the preamble.

Mr. CARTER. We will reach that as soon as the bill has been passed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if this title was acquired, or if the condemnation proceedings passed to judgment and the Government failed to acquire title merely because there was an insufficient appropriation?

Mr. CARTER. That is reported as the fact by the District Commissioners and the board having the matter in charge. The original boundary on the east side of Rock Creek Park was at the point referred to—Sixteenth street. The funds available to pay for the land condemned became exhausted, leaving certain portions of the land outside of the limits of the park because payment could not be made. This is for the purpose of correcting the boundary, as it is invaded by certain private property west of that street. This bill is prepared and presented to remedy that.

Mr. BAILEY. Did the original act authorize the acquisition of this property?

Mr. CARTER. The original act so authorized.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I really think this is another case of where a man wants to own all the land adjoining his. The District Commissioners are not any more exempt from that infirmity than are private individuals, and I suppose the next time they will buy the tract adjoining this.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I perceive the logic of the Senator's remark as applied to another condition; but in this case a very cursory examination of the map will show that the fragments here and there west of Sixteenth street are in private ownership. It was originally contemplated that all west of Sixteenth street should be within that park, so that this private land is now bounded on the north and south and west by the park and on the east by Sixteenth street.

Mr. BAILEY. If this was part of the original plan, I shall not object to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARTER. I now move that the preamble be omitted.

The preamble was rejected.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILSON, N. C.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4368) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Wilson, N. C.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment on page 2, line 1, after the word "sum of," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Wilson and State of North Carolina, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $75,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for opening of said proposals.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAHABA POWER COMPANY.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16051) to authorize the Centreville Power Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Alabama, to construct a dam across the Cahaba River, in said State, at or near Centerville, Ala.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment in section 1, page 1, line 3, before the words "Power Company," to strike out "Centreville" and insert "Cahaba;" so as to make the section read:

That the Cahaba Power Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Alabama, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the Cahaba River at Centerville, in the State of Alabama, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Cahaba Power Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Alabama, to construct a dam across the Cahaba River, in said State, at or near Centerville, Ala."

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5589) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place upon the pension roll, at the rate per month therein specified, the following-named persons:

Mary L. Chase, widow of Washington I. Chase, late captain Company H, Ninth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, $20.

Mary C. Nason, widow of Christopher C. Nason, late of Company B, Fourth Regiment California Volunteer Infantry, $16.

Orrin V. S. Van Denburg, late of Company L, Twelfth Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

Robert T. Sedam, late of Company C, Fifteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, $30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the paragraph which will be read.

The SECRETARY. The paragraph, on page 12, from line 15 to line 18, reads as follows:

The name of Alice J. Hackney, late of Company D, and unassigned Twenty-first Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to amend the bill by striking out that paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4035) to provide for the payment of certain claims against the District of Columbia in accordance with the act of Congress approved January 26, 1897, and as amended July 19, 1897.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to hear the bill read. We have just heard the title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The SECRETARY read the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is a bill providing for the payment of eight claims of $200 each for the destruction of the so-called "Northern Liberty Market." Three hundred claims have been paid, and these eight persons are nonresidents and were not served with notice at the time.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. In connection with the bill, I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD a brief letter from the auditor of the District of Columbia, which explains the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, February 15, 1908.

Maj. J. J. MORROW,
Engineer Commissioner, District of Columbia.

SIR: In regard to Senate bill 4035, to provide for the payment of certain claims against the District of Columbia in accordance with the act of Congress approved January 26, 1897, and as amended July 19, 1897, I am advised that these claims, so far as it is now known, are all that remain unsettled of the claims arising from the destruction of the Northern Liberty Market.

With respect to one of the claims presented in the bill, I am further advised that while the original claim was presented before the auditor in due time, by reason of the negligence of the attorney representing the claimant at that time, the necessary proof was not submitted, and that the other claims mentioned therein are those of parties living outside of Washington who were not notified by advertisement and were therefore unable to present their proof within the time specified by law. In view of the circumstances, therefore, it is believed to be but a matter of simple justice to enable these parties to present their claims before the auditor of the supreme court, District of Columbia, for settlement.

Very respectfully,

A. TWEEDALE,
Auditor, District of Columbia.

MINING TECHNOLOGY BRANCH IN GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Mr. TELLER. When the joint resolution (S. R. 35) to provide for a mining technology branch in the Geological Survey was called up, I objected to its consideration. I now wish to withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado withdraws his objection to the consideration of the Senate joint resolution which he has named.

Mr. DICK. The Senator from Colorado having withdrawn his objection, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The SECRETARY read the joint resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is too important a measure, Mr. President, to take up at this time, and I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to give notice, in response to several inquiries, that I shall try to get the Indian appropriation bill up to-morrow.

RED RIVER BRIDGE AT SHREVEPORT, LA.

Mr. McENERY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16955) to extend the time for building a bridge across Red River at Shreveport, La.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee on the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 5 of the act of Congress approved February 3, 1905, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Red River at Shreveport, La.," so as to read as follows:

SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from February 3, 1908.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND WATER RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FLINT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4171) to provide for continuation of investigations of the rivers and water resources of the United States.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Director of the United States Geological Survey to continue his investigation of the rivers and water resources of the United States, with special reference to the amount of water available for the development and maintenance of inland water navigation, irrigation, and such other water-supply development as the Government of the United States is now or may hereafter be engaged upon; also the determination of the quality and fitness of the water for use in irrigation and other industrial processes and the damage arising to said waters by reason of sewage and other pollution, and to report thereon; but this authority shall not extend to the investigation of purely intrastate problems, except such investigations as are essential to the prosecution and maintenance of inland water navigation, irrigation, or other water-supply work authorized by acts of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to inquire of the Senator from California as to whether or not there is a fund from which the expense of these investigations is paid?

Mr. FLINT. This bill does not carry an appropriation. An appropriation has been made each year for this purpose, but the point of order was raised in the House of Representatives that it was not within the power of the Geological Survey to carry on this work. This bill is now introduced for the sole purpose of giving the Geological Survey express authority to do the work.

Mr. GALLINGER. And there is an unexpended amount of money now in the Treasury for this purpose?

Mr. FLINT. There is an appropriation made each year for this purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is there an unexpended amount at the present time?

Mr. TELLER. I think there is.

Mr. GALLINGER. If there is, of course, I see no objection to the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I do not myself believe it is necessary to pass this bill, but the Senator from California says question was raised in the House when an appropriation was made for this purpose as to whether there was any authority in the Director of the Geological Survey to carry on these investigations. He has carried them on for the last twenty years at least, and I do not think there is any question about his authority, but the bill is reported to avoid the condition that arose before, when the item was thrown out of the appropriation bill on a point of order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand from the Senator from California that if this bill passes no money will be required to be appropriated.

Mr. FLINT. The appropriation is made each year.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know it is made each year, but is there an unexpended balance in the Treasury?

Mr. FLINT. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. Every year there is a large fund given for this purpose by a particular provision in one of the appropriation bills. The Director of the Geological Survey has been using this fund for that purpose heretofore, and he will probably get no more and no less than he has been getting.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC EDUCATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask unanimous consent that Order of Business 177, being the bill (S. 4032) to establish the direction and control of public education in the District of Columbia, be taken up to-morrow after the regular morning business immediately following the order made at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] providing for the consideration of the bill relative to ocean mail service, etc.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator want to dispose of that bill to-morrow?

Mr. BURKETT. I want to get started and do something.

Mr. TELLER. If it is proposed to consider it all day and dispose of it, I shall have to object.

Mr. FRYE and Mr. ALDRICH. The unfinished business comes up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. BURKETT. We can not take the bill up after 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 4032, to establish the direction and control of public education in the District of Columbia be made the special order to-morrow after the disposition of the so-called "shipping bill." Is there objection?

Mr. TELLER. I understand the request contemplates merely using the time up until 2 o'clock?

Mr. BURKETT. It could not supplant the unfinished business, and that will be taken up at 2 o'clock, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I think if it is made the special order, there might be some such claim. I do not think that is the order the Senator wants.

Mr. GALLINGER. He wants unanimous consent.

Mr. TELLER. He wants unanimous consent simply to take up the bill.

Mr. BURKETT. That is my request.

Mr. TELLER. If the bill is made a special order, then it would have the right of way against the finance bill.

Mr. BURKETT. I only expected to ask it in that way. I understood, because I had consulted others, that there was an unfinished business before the Senate, which would be taken up at 2 o'clock. I intended to make the request simply to take up the bill to-morrow in the morning hour, if there is any time remaining after the Senator from New Hampshire gets through with his bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I think I shall have to object at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BURKETT. Then to-morrow at that time I will move, if there is any time left, that the Senate take up the bill.

DELAWARE AND HUDSON COMPANY.

Mr. OVERMAN. At the request of the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5043) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to convey to the Delaware and Hudson Company a right of way for railway purposes upon and across the military reservation of Plattsburg Barracks, at Plattsburg, in the county of Clinton and State of New York, in exchange for the release to the United States of all rights of said company and its subsidiary companies within the limits of said military reservation. The Senator from West Virginia is necessarily absent from the Chamber, and at his request I call up the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVENUE CUTTER FOR SERVICE IN NARRAGANSETT BAY.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me to have a small bill passed?

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4567) to provide for the construction and equipment of a revenue cutter for service in Narragansett Bay and adjacent waters. It will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to insert at the end of the bill the words "to take the place of the revenue cutter Dexter," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $225,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in constructing and equipping a steam revenue cutter for service in Narragansett Bay and adjacent waters, with headquarters at Newport, R. I., to take the place of the revenue cutter Dexter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the construction and equipment of a revenue cutter for service in Narragansett Bay and adjacent waters, to take the place of the revenue cutter Dexter."

Mr. FRYE. I am obliged to the Senator from Montana.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 27, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That at the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on Saturday, March 7, legislative duties be suspended and eulogies on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. CAMPBELL SLEMP, late a Representative from Virginia, shall be in order.

There was no objection to the consideration, and the order was agreed to.

FIRST ASSISTANT ENROLLING CLERK.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House for the services of a first assistant enrolling clerk a sum equal to the rate of $2,500 per annum, payable monthly, until the compensation at said rate shall be provided for by law. Said clerk to be in lieu of the assistant enrolling clerk now authorized at $2,000 per annum.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the reading of the resolution, and I desire to ask the gentleman from West Virginia how many clerks this gives the Committee on Enrolled Bills?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. No additional clerk, but it is an increase of salary from two thousand to twenty-five hundred dollars.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many are there employed there?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Three; one at eighteen hundred dollars, one at two thousand, and one at three thousand.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is in the enrolling room?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many clerks has the Committee on Enrolled Bills?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Two.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say that my reason for making the inquiry is the fact that the matter of enrolling bills at this session of Congress has been delayed very seriously, in some cases much longer than there ought to be occasion for. The chairman of that committee informed me that it was because of a want of sufficient force.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. The chairman of the committee has all the force he needs at the present time; he has one regular clerk, and we let him have one assistant, and a little later in the session when he has more bills we will allow him another clerk.

The resolution was agreed to.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 236.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, for the services of an assistant clerk to the Committee on Claims, a sum equal to the rate of $1,200 per annum until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Does this make the assistant clerk an annual clerk?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is he now a session clerk?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. No; they have no clerk at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is just increasing his compensation?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. No; they have a clerk at $2,000 a year. This asks for an additional clerk at $1,200 a year.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the necessity of making him an annual clerk?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. I yield five minutes' time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER], the chairman of the Committee on Claims, and he will inform the House.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of indifference to me whether the House allows an additional clerk or not. If the House wants the bills before the Committee on Claims considered at all we must have an additional clerk. Possibly one at $6 per day during the session would answer the purpose, but in order to do the work as I want it done I want to bring some one from my own district here to take charge of that work—some one in whom I have confidence—and not employ some clerk in the city of Washington, who generally is looking after bills, trying to lobby them through this House. That is why I ask for an annual clerk. If we are allowed this assistant clerk at $1,200 a year the Committee on Claims will hereafter report out all bills they consider, either favorably or adversely. We already have marked for report six bills adversely, and when the next bills come to the House those reports will come in here. I believe with this assistant clerk that we can save the United States in the neighborhood of from $10,000 to $100,000 a year.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ASSIGNING ROOMS TO COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS AND THE SPEAKER.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice at this time that to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal I expect to call up for consideration the following House resolution, No. 217, a privileged resolution, relating to the assignment of rooms to the Committee on Ways and Means and to the Speaker:

Resolved, That the rooms in the House Office Building bearing the following temporary numbers, according to the plats accompanying House resolution No. 53, passed by the House December 19, 1907, to wit, 313, 314, and 315, and the large room at the southwest corner of the House Office Building, be, and the same are hereby, assigned for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means, and to the same committee as an additional room for temporary use the room on the House floor of the Capitol Building now occupied by the Speaker, and that the rooms now occupied by the Committee on Ways and Means are hereby assigned for the use of the Speaker.

HOMESTEAD ENTRY ON ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS, STATE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15859), providing for the homestead entry of certain lands in the State of Washington, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the lands in abandoned military reservations Nos. 23 and 24, described as follows: Lots 1 and 2 in section 5 and lot 3 in section 6, of township 20 north, and the southwest quarter, the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter, and lots 3 and 4 of section 21, and the northwest quarter, the west half of the northeast quarter, lots 1, 2, and 3, and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 28, and the south half of lot 3 and all of lots 4 and 5, and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 31, the south half of the south half of the northwest quarter, the south half of the south half of the northeast quarter, and lots 1 and 2 and the west half of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter and the southwest quarter of section 32, and the south half of lot 2 and all of lot 3 of section 33, in township 21 north, all in range 2 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Washington, or any part thereof, to be regularly surveyed or subdivided into tracts or lots of 20 acres each, more or less.

SEC. 2. That after said survey and the approval thereof by the Commissioner of the General Land Office the plat thereof shall be filed in the office of the register and receiver in the manner provided by law, and thereafter any settler who is in actual occupation of any portion of the lands described in section 1 hereof at the date of the passage of this act who has settled thereon in good faith for the purpose of securing a home, and is by law entitled to make a homestead entry, shall be entitled to enter the land so occupied, not exceeding 20 acres in a body, according to the Government surveys and subdivisions thereof, upon payment to the Government of the sum of $2.50 per acre for each acre entered by him, and upon showing residence and cultivation of such lands in the manner and for the length of time required by the homestead laws of the United States.

SEC. 3. That the following-described land, being a part of abandoned military reservation No. 24, is hereby granted to school district No. 71 of Pierce County, State of Washington, to wit: The east half of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 32 in township 21 of range 2 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Washington.

SEC. 4. That if any of the lands described in section 1 hereof be not duly entered as a homestead by some settler, as provided in section 1 of this act, within ninety days after the same become subject to entry under the provisions of this act, then, in that event, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to dispose of such remaining lands under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 5, 1884, entitled "An act to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations."

With the following amendment:

Add to the end of section 3 the following: "upon payment therefor to the United States of $2.50 per acre."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman give us some information about this.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill relates to two small abandoned military reservations in the State of Washington, containing about 1,249 acres. The War Department long ago abandoned them as military reservations and turned them over to the Interior Department to dispose of under existing law. The existing law which relates to abandoned military reservations provides that any man who settled on one of these reservations in the year 1884, to wit, twenty-four years ago, is entitled to make a homestead entry. The only change in substance which this bill makes to existing law is to reduce the term of residence required by the settler. No settlers have resided on this land for twenty-four years, but settlers have resided a number of years thereon, and this bill simply gives the right to any bona fide settler now residing on any of these lands to enter 20 acres thereof under the homestead law and get title under the homestead law upon payment of $2.50 per acre and proof of residence and cultivation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much now will this land sell for on the market?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Probably about $20 an acre.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And we are selling it now for $2.50 an acre?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes, to actual settlers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How far is it from Tacoma city?

Mr. CUSHMAN. About 6 miles.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How far is it from water—from the ocean or from a navigable stream?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Both pieces of land front on navigable water on Puget Sound.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When the gentleman gets through I desire to have two or three minutes.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I desire to state that the War Department has long ago concluded they did not need the land and are willing that it should be disposed of. The bill is recommended by the Land Department of the Government and reported from the House Committee on the Public Lands with a favorable recommendation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserved the right to object. I want to heard on this for a moment. Will the gentleman yield some of his time?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall object anyhow at this time.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

DAM ACROSS MULBERRY FORK OF BLACK WARRIOR RIVER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16746) to authorize T. H. Friel or assigns to construct a dam across Mulberry Fork of the Warrior River.

Be it enacted, etc., That T. H. Friel or assigns be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the Mulberry Fork of the Warrior River, at a point within 10 miles north and within 2 miles south of its junction with the Sipsey Fork, in Walker County, in the State of Alabama, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In line 5, after the word "the," insert the word "Black."

In the second line of title, after the word "the," insert the word "Black."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that the title should be amended so as to read "Black Warrior River."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize T. H. Friel or assigns to construct a dam across Mulberry Fork of the Black Warrior River."

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR SECOND DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16078) providing for second desert-land entries.

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who prior to the passage of this act has made entry under the desert-land laws, but from any cause has lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same, shall be entitled to the benefits of the desert-land law as though such former entry had not been made, and any person applying for a second desert-land entry under this act shall furnish the description and date of his former entry: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person whose former entry was canceled for fraud or who relinquished the former entry for a valuable consideration.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

After the words "was," in line 11, insert the words "assigned in whole or in part or."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BONYNGE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. JOSEPH RIVER AT OR NEAR ITS MOUTH.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17227) to authorize the city of St. Joseph, Mich., to construct a bridge across the St. Joseph River at or near its mouth.

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of St. Joseph, Mich., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Joseph River, at or near its mouth, in Berrien County, in the State of Michigan, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR A TERM OF UNITED STATES CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS AT LANDER, WYO.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following Senate bill, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4064) to provide for a term of the United States circuit and district courts at Lander, Wyo.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter, and until otherwise provided by law, there shall be held annually on the first Monday in October a term of the circuit and district courts for the district of Wyoming at the town of Lander, in said district.

SEC. 2. That the marshal and clerk of said district shall each, respectively, appoint at least one deputy, to reside in said town of Lander, unless he himself shall reside there, and he shall also maintain an office at that place.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, however, That a place shall be furnished for holding of said courts without any expense to the Government of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand this bill is a bill appointing an additional term of court in Wyoming. It does not create any new division.

Mr. MONDELL. It does not.

Mr. PAYNE. There is but one district in Wyoming?

Mr. MONDELL. But one district.

Mr. PAYNE. And this is the proper geographical location?

Mr. MONDELL. The point is some 300 miles distant from the nearest point in which terms of court are now held, and the committee, after investigation, were of the opinion that the holding of a term of court at Lander would result in a large saving to the Government as well as to those who may have to come before it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I observe from the reading of the bill that the place for holding court is to be provided without expense to the Government of the United States. Am I right?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is correct; that is the committee amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Who is to pay the expense?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, under the bill as it is now before the House, it would be necessary for the good people of Lander to allow the United States to hold court in their court-house.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that this is more for the purpose of laying a foundation for a demand for a public building in the future than it is for the convenience of the public in Wyoming having business in that court.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that that query that is so often made on the floor of the House in regard to bills of this sort does not apply to this bill at all. In the first place, provision has already been made for the public building at Lander, so that they could have no such object as that in view. In the second place, the town of Lander is over 300 miles from the nearest point where court is now held. A large number of cases in the Federal court originate in that region, and the committee, after careful consideration of the facts, conclude that the holding of the term of court here would be a matter of large saving to the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the last Congress the President vetoed some bills like this, basing his action upon a document prepared by the Attorney-General as to the impropriety of the Federal court being dependent on the generosity of the inhabitants of any particular place. Has the gentleman from Wyoming any reason to believe that the President has changed his mind on that question?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has no information on that subject, and the gentleman regrets the amendment. But if we can have the legislation in any other form I think arrangements could be made with the good people of Lander whereby their very large and commodious court-house could be used for holding a term of the Federal court.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not my intention to object. I wish simply to emphasize this fact—that if the President of the United States will not approve bills in this form, and the committee will not recommend them for passage without the particular amendment to which the President objects, how does the gentleman hope to have any legislation providing for the court at Lander?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the question of what will happen to the legislation in some other place is not one that the gentleman cares to consider or thinks ought to be considered at this time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman it does not bother me very much, but I supposed, in view of what has happened, that perhaps the gentleman had taken the precaution to ascertain what would happen to a bill of this kind.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wyoming informs the House that the place for the holding of this court is to be provided at the expense of the people in the town or city in which the court is to be held. We have a statute that prohibits any executive officer or any Department of the Government from accepting voluntary service, and I think the spirit of that statute, if the letter does not, should apply to Congress as it applies to the Executive Departments, and I shall object.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do.

PHOENIX, ARIZ., BONDS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13097) which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13097) to enable the city of Phoenix, in Maricopa County, Ariz., to issue bonds of said municipality for the purpose of funding its floating indebtedness incurred prior to July 1, 1906.

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Phoenix, situated in Maricopa County, in the Territory of Arizona, is hereby authorized and empowered to issue its bonds in any sum not exceeding $155,000 for the funding of its floating indebtedness created prior to July 1, 1906, and represented by outstanding warrants bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

SEC. 2. That before said bonds shall be issued a special election shall be ordered by the common council of the city of Phoenix, at which election the question whether such bonds shall be issued shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said city of Phoenix whose names appear on the last assessment roll of said city for municipal taxation. Thirty days' notice of any such election shall be given by publication thereof in a newspaper printed and published and of general circulation in said city before the day fixed for such election.

SEC. 3. That the registration for such election, the manner of conducting the same, and the canvass of the returns of said election shall be, as nearly as practicable, in accordance with the requirements of law in general or special elections in said municipality, and said bonds shall be issued only upon the condition that a majority of the votes cast at such election in said city shall be in favor of issuing said bonds.

SEC. 4. That the bonds above specified, when authorized to be issued as hereinbefore provided, shall bear interest at a rate not to exceed 5 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and shall not be sold for less than their par value with accrued interest, and shall be in denominations of $1,000 each, the principal to be due in twenty-five years from date thereof: Provided, however, That the common council of said city of Phoenix may reserve the right to pay off such bonds in their numerical order at the rate of $25,000 thereof per annum from and after the expiration of fifteen years from their date. Principal and interest shall be payable in lawful money of the United States of America at the office of the city treasurer of the city of Phoenix, in Maricopa County, Ariz., or at such bank in the city of New York, in the State of New York, or such place as may be designated by the common council of the city of Phoenix at the option of the holder of said bonds; the place of payment to be mentioned in said bonds: And provided further, That each and every such bond shall have a facsimile of the signature of the mayor and recorder of said city of Phoenix lithographed or printed thereon.

SEC. 5. That no part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose other than that specified in this act.

SEC. 6. That said bonds shall be sold only in such amounts as the common council shall direct, and the proceeds thereof shall be disbursed under the limitations hereinbefore imposed and under the order and direction of said common council from time to time as the same may be required for the purposes aforesaid.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if I understand this bill correctly it is this: That the law now prohibits the city of Phoenix from incurring indebtedness beyond a certain amount, and thereupon, in practical violation of the law, they go ahead and incur floating indebtedness, although the law does not permit, and now ask that we shall permit them to issue bonds and pay up their floating indebtedness and let them go over the same performance again if they choose to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, the facts are simply these: Prior to 1906, in a fast growing village that has since become a city, the common council of the city in the general running of the same, did to some extent what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said. Inadvertently the various city councils overran slightly each year, considerably some years, the amount the city took in in cash from its assessments. In 1906 the attention of the city council was called to this fact and a limitation of 70 cents on the hundred dollars had been found inadequate, and that it was required in the city charter that no indebtedness should be contracted except within the 70-cent limitation, and on that fact coming to the attention of the city council, they put it on a cash basis, and it has been on a cash basis from that day on. That leaves these warrants for services under contracts entered into by the city, many with poor men, and this debt is held almost exclusively by the people of the city of Phoenix. I am so informed by the resolution of the mayor and Chamber of Commerce of that city, and there is no objection to it from anyone there. I am pressed to take this burden off, for it is an obligation which the city ought to pay and which the city is able to pay, but with this limitation in her charter she is unable to make provision for the payment of these outstanding warrants. And I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. MANN. It is possible the city ought to be permitted to raise more money for its running expenses; but I do not believe that Congress ought to permit a city, where it has control, to borrow money to pay its ordinary running expenses.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is not in a sense a question of borrowing money; but it is a matter as to whether or not the people who have performed services without any notice that they should, before they could get their money, have to ask Congress to permit them to provide for paying an honest debt.

Mr. MANN. That is true. That makes a strong equity on that city. That is the case of every city where its permission to incur indebtedness is limited. It sometimes falls heavily upon those who furnish the city with goods or services; but every State in the Union, I think, has a provision limiting the amount of indebtedness which cities may incur; and the same reason would apply to every city. Now, I do not think that we ought to enter into that business at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I hope my friend will not raise an objection to this. He recognizes the difficulties under which that Territory operates.

Mr. MANN. For the present, I object.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Army. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that there may be an extension of forty minutes for general debate; twenty minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill; and, pending that, asks that the time for general debate may be extended for forty minutes—twenty minutes on a side. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a compilation of the number of soldiers killed, and the whereabouts of their graves, that fell at the battle of New Orleans in 1815. I have just received it from the Secretary of War. It has never been printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the matter referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman, do I understand him to say that this is a compilation of the Secretary of War?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; very short, and personal to me. I had sent for it. We need it here every day, and we have never had it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The compilation is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, February 24, 1908.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
House of Representatives, Washington.

SIR: Referring to previous correspondence on the subject of the location of the graves of soldiers killed in the battle of New Orleans, I have the honor to inclose you herewith press copy of a report just received from the superintendent of the Chalmette, La., National Cemetery, together with two blueprints showing "The Battlefield of Chalmette" and "Operations Near New Orleans in 1814–15."

The depot quartermaster, New Orleans, La., in forwarding this report, states that every known avenue has been exhausted in the endeavor to obtain the information desired; that he caused a statement to appear in all the local press requesting that any authentic information bearing on the subject be forwarded to him, but that replies have been meager and of no consequence, beyond the fact that it may be possible to identify one, or perhaps two, of the unknown interments. He states further, however, that he has written to several parties whom he is led to believe may be able to furnish authentic data, and will forward their replies as soon as received.

As soon as any additional reports are received on this subject I will forward them to you.

Respectfully,
J. B. ALESHIRE,
Quartermaster-General, United States Army.

CHALMETTE, LA., NATIONAL CEMETERY,
Arabi, La., February 20, 1908.

The QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C.
(Through the Depot Quartermaster, United States Army, New Orleans, La.)

GENERAL: Having reference to letter of your office 242393, dated January 22, 1908, in relation to the graves of soldiers, etc., who fell in the battle of New Orleans, I have the honor to submit the following:

Question 1. Is there any record of the interments in your national cemetery of the remains of any of the soldiers killed in the battle of New Orleans? If so, give list of names, rank, company, regiments, dates of death, and grave numbers; how the graves are marked, with copy of the inscriptions upon the monuments or headstones.

Answer. There is no record of any interments at this cemetery.

Question 2. If any of the soldiers are buried in unknown graves, state the number of remains so buried, whether interred in separate graves or mounds, and how the graves or mounds are marked, with copy of inscriptions.

Answer. There are none, so far as I can ascertain.

Question 3. Describe in detail the location of the graves, the size of the plot, and its condition, i. e., whether planted with trees, shrubs, etc.

Answer. No graves.

Question 4. If no soldiers of the war of 1814–15 are interred in the national cemetery, give all the information which you can obtain relative to their place of burial, etc., as requested in queries Nos. 1, 2, and 3.

Answer. In order to obtain intelligent information relative to replying to this question, I found it necessary to examine the official records relative to the campaign in southern Louisiana, 1814–15. The following is from appendix to Historical Memoirs of the War in West Florida and Louisiana in 1814–15, with an atlas, by Maj. A. La Carriere Latour, principal engineer in the late seventh military district, United States Army. Written originally in French and translated for the author by H. P. Nugent, esq., Philadelphia. Published by John Conrad & Co., J. Maxwell, printer, 1816. (Copies in Memorial Hall and Howard's Library, New Orleans. Not published in French.)

Appendix. Pages LVIII, LIX, LX.

Letter from Adjt. Gen. Robert Butler to Brigadier-General Parker, dated: Headquarters seventh military district, adjutant-general's office, Jackson's lines, below New Orleans, January 16, 1815.

Truly reported from those on file in this office.

ROBERT BUTLER.

(The recapitulation shows an error of 2; the dead should be 57, making a total of 335.)

The battle of January 8, 1815, is commonly called the "battle of New Orleans," but I have included the preceding combats, not knowing that the Department might not require them.

Of the killed, or those who died of wounds received in these battles, I have located the graves of the following:

Across the river from this cemetery, and slightly nearer New Orleans, in west side of two center pecan trees, in a row of four trees, 200 feet south of levee and a similar distance west of old fortifications, in a plot of ground 30 by 38 feet, grown with grass and weeds and surrounded by sugar-cane plantation, are 12 unknown soldiers of the war of 1814–15. The land belongs to a Mr. Norman, of New Orleans. Authority for statement of the interments: Silas Dozier, laborer of this cemetery, who claims to have often had the graves pointed out to him by John Elsie, who died about twenty years ago and was a slave of Major De La Ronde. Age at death about 110. Some of these soldiers, according to said Dozier's report of Elsie's statements, were brought from the east bank of the river and belonged to the Forty-fourth United States Infantry, were white men, and taken across and buried by marines.

Local tradition refers to five American soldiers as being killed on west bank of river January 8, 1815, and these are supposed to be included in the twelve interments. Several gentlemen of New Orleans acquainted with this land have informed me that the graves were about this point, but they could not locate the exact spot. According to Dozier's (Elsie's) statement, there are some citizens buried near pecan trees Nos. 1 and 4, but only those soldiers west of trees Nos. 2 and 3 in row. There is now no sinkage or other evidence of graves furthermore than that this plot in the center of sugar cane has been left uncultivated and is known as a graveyard. There are no headstones.

The following graves in old St. Louis Cemetery No. 1, New Orleans, La., near rear wall and close to each other, are in a dilapidated, abandoned part of cemetery near rear wall, surrounded by vaults in a similar broken condition, in the midst of brush, weeds, and neglect, and accessible only by climbing over a mound of débris formed from the burning of coffins and of sweepings of shell and earth from other parts of cemetery:

In a brick overground vault about 2 feet high, brickwork broken and in very bad condition, granite slab 2 feet 6 inches by 5 feet 6 inches leaning against brickwork instead of covering as formerly; inscription as follows:

"Erected to the memory of Oliver Parmlee, a native of New England, who was killed in the defense of the city of New Orleans in the battle with the British army December 23, 1814; age, 29."

[a] NOTE.—Of the killed, wounded, and missing on this day but 6 were killed and 7 wounded in the action on the east bank of the river, and the residue in a sortie after the action and in the action on the west bank.

Next grave to Parmlee, at right angles to same and farther from wall, in stone overground vault about 2 feet high, one side of vault broken open, and with granite slab 3 feet 6 inches by 6 feet on top:

"In memory of Dr. Asabel Brunson, a native of Halifax County, N. C. Moved with his father to Tennessee in the spring of 1805. Departed this life in the Army at New Orleans February 15, 1815, aged 26 years 4 months and 9 days."

Near wall, distance of one grave from Parmlee, in broken-brick overground vault with flat granite slab 3 feet 6 inches by 7 feet, which should cover vault, partly on brickwork and partly under reclining tree at foot of tomb; inscription as follows:

"Sacred to the memory of William P. Canby, midshipman, U. S. Navy, born at Norfolk, Va., August 30, 1796, who fell in the unequal combat between the U. S. gunboat squadron and the British flotilla at Lake Borgne, near New Orleans, December 14, 1814."

A Mr. McClellan, of 1927 Bayou road, between Roman and R——, informs me that three of the soldiers from the battle of January 8, 1815, were taken to Opelousas, parish of St. Landry, and there buried in the Catholic cemetery. He refers to the men thus:

"———— Barre: Wounded and died.

"———— Landry: Killed.

"Charles Claude: Died six months later of wounds."

He states that about thirty-eight years ago, when he last visited that cemetery, they had headstones with inscriptions in the French language. * * *

The postmaster of Opelousas states that he can not find graves nor headstones nor any church records dealing with them.

The following inscriptions are taken from tombs at cemeteries in New Orleans, of soldiers who served in the war of 1814–15, but who died later than the battle of New Orleans:

In old St. Louis Cemetery No. 2, in a brick vault about 5 feet high, in fair condition, and with stone slab, about 2 feet square, set in brickwork:

"Dominique You.

"Intrepide guerrier, sur la terre et sur l'onde. Il sut dans cent combats, signaler sa valeur; et ce nouveau Bayard, sans reproche et sans peur, aurait pu, sans trembler, voir s'ecrouler le monde."

(This I translate as follows: "Dominick You. An intrepid warrior, both on land and sea. He was in one hundred combats; distinguished himself by valor; and was a new Bayard, without fear, without reproach, could gaze on the universe being shivered into atoms without trembling.")

This is in the middle of Center avenue, and with similar tombs and shell walks all around.

Authority: "One of Jackson's lieutenants who served under Jackson at the battle of New Orleans." (Times-Democrat, December 11, 1905.)

Just inside gate in St. Louis Cemetery No. 2, on Center avenue, is a brick tomb about 10 feet high, in excellent condition, with the following inscription on marble slab set in brickwork:

"Ici repose Ursin Frederic ne a la N. O. 1er Aout, 1792, mort le 15 Sept. 1816. Veteran de 1814–1815."

In the bottom space of high brick vault in first-class condition, St. Louis Cemetery No. 1, New Orleans, not far from corner farthest from Basin and Canal streets:

"Ici repose Dominique Foster decede le 6 Janvier, 1867, a l'age de 73 ans, ne a Pensacole, Floride. Veteran de 1814 et 1815."

Similar tombs and shell walks all around both this and preceding.

The following is taken from appendix to book previously quoted, page lxxi:

"A list of killed and wounded during the bombardment of Fort St. Philip, commencing on the 9th and ending on the 18th of January, 1815:

"Captain Wolstoncraft's artillery, wounded, 3.

"Captain Bronton's infantry, wounded, 1.

"Captain Wade's infantry, wounded, 2.

"Captain Murry's artillery, killed, 2; wounded, 1."

None of these have been located by me.

There is buried in this cemetery (Chalmette), in square 107, grave No. 8795, James A. Franks, U. S. C. T. Inscription on Government headstone, "8795, J. A. Franks, U. S. C. T." Inscription on private headstone, "James A. Franks, died January 24, 1847. He was a member of the Monroe company, Second Regiment Mississippi Volunteers."

This grave is about 30 feet from west wall and near second rear circle of cemetery drive. The records do not show that the remains had been disinterred from any other place, and I assume it to be the original grave. Immediately outside west wall, and in cemetery at this point, local tradition pronounces an old burying ground, but who were buried there is unknown. Whether Franks belongs to the war of 1814–15, I do not know. If he belonged to the said war, it is possible that more of his comrades are buried here; but despite unlimited inquiries in relation to it, I have been unable to acquire any information.

No further information acquired by me relative to graves of soldiers killed in 1814–15 near Chalmette National Cemetery, New Orleans.

Question 5. What part of the national cemetery occupies the land on which the battle of New Orleans was fought; what portion of such land is outside the national cemetery reservation, by whom is it owned, what is its condition, and for what purpose used; are any of the soldiers who fell in the battle supposed to be buried in this land; and if so, are the graves identified as such, and how are they marked?

Answer. The accompanying map of the battle of New Orleans shows the line of ditch and embankments better than any description I could give. The extension (1,500 yards) into swamp is based on "Plan of the battle of New Orleans, enlarged by Aime Bercegeay, draftsman, under the direction of Louis Palms, chief clerk United States surveyor-general's office for the district of Louisiana, from the plan on page 187 in the history of the rifle brigade (the ninety-fifth), by Sir William H. Cope, Bart." (copy inclosed)—the scaling of which shows the American lines as having extended 1,500 yards inland from river. Surrounding land on all sides of cemetery belongs to the "New Orleans Terminal Company," office, New Orleans, La. The use to which the land is put is marked on map; it is all nearly level, the fall from river to rear being about 6 feet; the front is kept dry by drainage, the rear gradually becomes swamp. (Excepting parish roads, front and rear, shown on map, which are public land.) It is probable that many British soldiers are buried in this land (east of ditch), but there is no evidence that any Americans are, unless they may possibly be in the old graveyard referred to above, and the location of which is marked on map. No marking of graves except as referred to in paragraphs indicated in preceding sentence.

I would assume all the cemetery and all the land marked on map, except possibly the strip running outside wall on west side, to be a part of the battlefield, but, with the assistance of the map, your office can form a more correct judgment.

The embankments and ditch still show as marked on map; the ditch is generally about 30 feet broad, and the embankments vary from 4 to 8 feet high; the ditch is always full of water and, during the growing season, overgrown with water lilies. Wherever the works entered cemetery they have been obliterated, but there is sufficient marking left to yet trace their course.

Nothing dealing with graves of these men, nor with the men, in records of St. Louis Cathedral.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS SHEA, Superintendent.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17288), which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. For some time past we have been engaged in the nominal discussion of appropriation bills, but in point of fact in the discussion of party policies. Charges have been made, and countercharges, upon either side of this aisle, and the merits of the two great parties contending for mastery have been discussed by each speaker, eulogistically of his own party and deprecatingly of the other. The time, in my judgment, has not been misspent. Such debate is characteristic of the governmental system under which we live, a system which was intended to be and is a government by party. And while it is true that there has been, as there always will be under such circumstances, much of exaggeration and sometimes of misrepresentation, nevertheless a dispassionate review of all that is said will serve to separate the true from the false.

The most noticeable thing in the discussion thus far has been the measure of credit that our Democratic friends are willing to concede to our Republican President. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is willing to do him honor in so far as he has been guided, he says, by Democratic principles. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] calls him one of the most extraordinary men in American history; declines to decide whether or not he is a great man; suggests that the answer be left to posterity, after the manner suggested by Lord Bacon, who, dying, left "his name and memory to men's charitable speeches, to foreign nations, and to the next age;" and then, with that kindliness which is so characteristic of him, wishes him happiness, prosperity, and length of days. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], with that candor and eloquence which are so characteristic of him, calls upon those who have shared his views in the past to join him in hailing the President, "on his disappearance from the field of contentious politics, as a shining ornament of popular government, a loyal exponent of truth, an intrepid champion of justice, a great hero in the glorious galaxy of American heroism."

While I am not of those who heretofore have shared the views of the gentleman from New York, I beg of him now that he permit me to be counted as one of the company that shares in his estimate of Theodore Roosevelt.

We are about to enter upon a campaign for the Presidency of the United States and for the control of this House of Representatives. The issue will be to some extent the platforms of the contending parties; to some extent, perhaps, the personality of the candidates; but mainly, I take it, the party records. And party records are to be judged not alone by party professions, or by achievements even; regard must be had to the consistency of party policies, to the measure of party loyalty thereto, and to the fidelity with which party pledges have been kept.

The Republican party invites the issue upon every ground—on that of its professions, its achievements, its consistency, and its loyalty to principles and pledges.

My eloquent friend from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] in his speech the other day did not confine himself to the discussion of such issues as seem to be of present and vital importance. He invited a review of the entire history of party differences from the beginning of the Republic to the present day. In so doing he advanced some claims so amazing in their character as to invite examination.

To Andrew Jackson, for instance, he, impliedly, at least, gives credit for the saving of the Union. To him he attributes the first declaration that the Federal Government possessed the power to prevent by force a nullification of its laws; but in that he is mistaken. Long before the time of Jackson George Washington announced the same doctrine and sent Alexander Hamilton at the head of an army to cross the Alleghenies and bring into subjection the rebels of western Pennsylvania, who sought a nullification of the revenue laws. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The doctrine of the indestructibility of the Union, which the gentleman attributes to Jackson, is the antithesis of Democratic doctrine up until 1865. Until that time Democratic doctrine continued to be the doctrine of the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of Jefferson and Madison, namely, not only that the Union was not indestructible, but that it represented only a compact from which there existed upon the part of individual States the right to withdraw. If the gentleman from New York is correct in saying that the indestructibility of the Union was Democratic doctrine in 1861, then he has stripped the Democratic party of the South, who sought to destroy the Union, of every vestige of claim that in so doing they believed they were acting within their rights. When they made war on the Union they either believed in the doctrine of the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions or they were inexpressibly wicked and deserve the condemnation of history.

Nothing can detract from the fame of Andrew Jackson, noble and fearless patriot that he was; but it still remains a historic truth that it was a weak and paltering Democratic President who listened to the advice of his Democratic Attorney-General, that there existed no power in the Government to coerce a sovereign State, and who sat idly by while the enemies of his country, every man of them a Democrat, possessed themselves of its arms, its ammunition, and its fortifications, and desecrated its flag. And it still remains a historic truth also that it was a Republican President who, backed by the heroism of a great people, not only said the Union must and shall be preserved, but preserved it for all our people, North and South alike, the priceless heritage of our fathers; and who, not born to the purple, a plain man of the people, wears such a crown of immortality as never in all the tide of time graced the brow of king or emperor, Abraham Lincoln. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

But the saving of the Union by Andrew Jackson is not the only achievement that the gentleman claims for his party.

He ventures the assertion—and it is a venturesome assertion—

That from the very first establishment of this Government there never has been a policy permanently incorporated into our political system that was not of Democratic origin.

I assert that there never has been such policy that was of Democratic origin, with the exception of the establishment of the independent Treasury system and the extension of territory in the interest of slavery.

The history of the United States is the history of the continuous struggle between two opposing schools of political thought. One school is represented by the party which has contended from the beginning that the United States is a nation, a solid, compact, sovereign State, while the other has contended that it is but a confederacy, an aggregation of sovereign States bound together by a Constitution, the terms of which are to be strictly construed. The conflict between these two schools of thought reaches back to the Revolution, prevailed in the Confederation, and made itself felt in the Convention which framed the Constitution. When the Constitution was framed and the new Government created thereby entered upon its experimental career this conflict gave rise to the two parties, which, under one name and another, struggled for mastery until a decision was rendered on the tented field in the greatest war of all time.

One of these parties was the party of Alexander Hamilton, the other that of Thomas Jefferson. One of these parties was the party of constructive statesmanship, the other the party of obstruction and criticism. He certainly is a bold man who, in the face of history, denies to-day that the permanent policies which have entered into and constitute our character as a nation are not the policies advocated by Alexander Hamilton and his followers.

Hamilton's relation to the Constitution was threefold—first, with respect to its formation; second, with respect to its adoption, and third, with respect to the rule of its construction. In its formation he bore but a comparatively small part, though

Guizot, the great Frenchman, said: "There is not in the Constitution of the United States an element of order, of force, or duration which he has not powerfully contributed to introduce into it and to cause to predominate." It can not be denied that, when made, the Constitution failed in many respects to meet his views. He regarded it as weak and, he feared, insufficient as a framework of successful government. My friend from Missouri, I think, attributes to the friends of Hamilton claims which they do not make. No man ought to deny that to James Madison rightly belongs the glorious title of father of the Constitution. [Applause.] But when it was finally framed, certainly no man did more nor any man so much as Hamilton to secure its adoption by the States. [Applause.] No treaties on statecraft in all the literature of government equals in perspicacity of thought, in clear and convincing logic, in attractiveness of style, the papers that constitute the Federalist. From out their pages their chief author stands a colossal figure in the world's history. [Applause.]

When, largely due to Hamilton's powerful influence, the Constitution was finally adopted, it was he who stamped upon it the character of nationality. His measures as Secretary of the Treasury embodied an entire system of public policy. Our system of taxation and finance to-day is his system. In the words of Webster: "He smote the rock of the national resources, and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth. He touched the dead corpse of the public credit, and it sprang upon its feet. The fabled birth of Minerva from the brain of Jove was hardly more sudden or more perfect than the financial system of the United States as it burst forth from the conception of Alexander Hamilton." [Applause.] In his first report on the public credit he advocated and sustained by unanswerable logic the policy of funding the public debt and of the assumption by the General Government of the debts of the States. Differ as men may as to these measures, there is no debatable ground as to the genius of their conception and the ability with which they were urged. Their significance was political, not commercial. To satisfy foreign creditors was to establish with them the power and importance of the Government which did them justice. To satisfy home creditors was to create friends in every State for the Central Government, which became their debtor, and to enlist the allegiance of their interest in its stability and resources. It was, in fact, to consolidate the Government and rally to its support all the elements of influence and power.

Close upon the heels of the funding system and the assumption of State debts came Hamilton's cherished project of a national bank. With its expediency or necessity we have nothing to do. The relation of the measure to constitutional construction is the whole of its importance for us.

Might this Federal Government, whose wheels were but lately set in motion, or might it not, create a bank? This was the question, for and against which men rallied with the enthusiasm of intense convictions. "Yes," said Hamilton, "though it be not written in terms, if it be useful, proper, and necessary in the enjoyment of the powers expressly granted, it is impliedly written in the Constitution." This fundamental doctrine of Hamiltonian federalism is to-day the law of the land, embodied in and justified by the clear logic of John Marshall, the greatest of American Chief Justices. [Applause on the Republican side.] Of any chief justice of any land the peer; pure, upright, fearless, and patriotic, a pioneer in an uncleared wilderness of jurisprudence, no problem ever left his great mind unsolved; no principle dear to the lovers of liberty ever passed under his pen without valuable elucidation and adornment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It was a further part of Hamilton's comprehensive statesmanship to enlist the national resources in the protection of the varied industries of his country. The growth and production of the materials natural and capable of adaptation to its soil and their manufacture were, in his judgment, entitled to the specific aid of the General Government. "Whatever," said he, "concerns the general interest of learning, of agriculture, of manufactures, and of commerce is within the sphere of the national concerns." That Government which to-day appropriates a portion of its means to scientific research and the diffusion of knowledge; which by protection fosters its home industries; which encourages a system of internal improvements interlocking the Lakes, binding ocean to ocean and Canada to the Gulf—expansive, practical, beneficent—as clearly stands his monument as does the grandeur of London's St. Paul's proclaim the genius of Sir Christopher Wren. [Applause on the Republican side.] Architects both, each in his sphere peerless; si quæris monumentum, circumspice.

This policy of internal improvements, is it not a permanent policy? Is it not firmly embedded in our system, and does it not now command universal support? Was it of Democratic origin?

The constitutionality of appropriations for internal improvements was denied by Jefferson, by Madison, and by Monroe. In the last moments of his official life Madison vetoed a bill "for constructing roads and canals and improving the navigation of water courses," for the reason that Congress had no constitutional power to expend the public revenues for any such purpose. Monroe in his first annual message announced in most explicit terms the same doctrine. Andrew Jackson followed. In his first annual message he condemned the constitutionality of an internal-improvement system, and in a veto message, May 27, 1830, summed up at great length the objections to the system. The first convention of the National Republicans (Whigs) asserted in one of its resolutions that "a uniform system of internal improvements, sustained and supported by the General Government, is calculated to secure in the highest degree the harmony, the strength, and the permanency of the Republic." From 1840 to 1864 the Democratic party quadrennially condemned the internal-improvement system in every shape and form.

From the foundation of the Government until the present day the tendency of our national life has been in accordance with the principles handed down by Hamilton—toward national control of all matters that a matured and intelligent public opinion hold to be of national concern. The tendency has been aggravated by the advance in the means of intercommunication whereby matters once considered of local interest are now recognized as of continental importance.

The gentleman from New York is no more fortunate in claiming for Andrew Jackson the credit for saving the Union than he is in claiming for Thomas Jefferson the credit of the Louisiana purchase.

It would serve but little purpose for me now to go into a lengthy discussion of that question. Only a word in passing, and I know that my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who is so thoroughly posted on this question, will recognize the truth of what I say as I go along. Mr. Jefferson never dreamed of acquiring any of the territory west of the Mississippi save only the post of New Orleans. And he never dreamed even of that until the western settlers, deprived of treaty rights of deposit at New Orleans, drove him to it. It was to acquire New Orleans only that he sent Monroe to France. Both he and his Secretary of State, Mr. Madison, saw nothing but danger in any acquisition of territory west of the Mississippi. To the French minister in Washington they explained that the United States had no interest in extending its population to the west bank, "since such extension would tend to weaken the State and to slacken the concentration of its forces." "In spite of affinities in manner and language," said his Secretary of State, "no colony beyond the river could exist under the same government, but would infallibly give birth to a separate State, having in its bosom germs of collision with the East, the easier to develop in proportion to the very affinity between the two Empires."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from what he is quoting now?

Mr. DALZELL. I am quoting from the writings of Jefferson.

But Robert Livingston, our minister to France, availed himself of his opportunity and of Napoleon's necessity and made the purchase of the great territory now constituting so many glorious States of the Union. The purchase took Jefferson by surprise. At first he thought he would cede a part of it to the Indians in exchange for their holdings on the east side of the Mississippi and "shut up all the rest from settlement for a long time to come." Then he raised the question of a constitutional amendment. "I suppose Congress must appeal to the nation for an additional article to the Constitution approving and confirming an act which the nation had not previously authorized," he wrote Senator Breckenridge, of Kentucky. "The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive in seizing the fugitive occurrence"—mark the term, the "fugitive occurrence"—"which so much advances the good of their country, have done an act beyond the Constitution."

When these views reached Livingston in France, he immediately gave Jefferson to understand that if the business were to be done over again, it never would be done. And thereupon Jefferson took alarm and immediately sent off another letter to Senator Breckenridge, in which he said:

I wrote you on the 12th instant on the subject of Louisiana and the constitutional provision which might be necessary for it. A letter just received yesterday shows that nothing must be said on that subject which may give a pretext for retreating, but that we should do sub silentio what shall be found necessary. Be so good, therefore, as to consider that part of my letter confidential.

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Was there any constitutional amendment ever afterwards suggested to indorse the Louisiana purchase? Certainly not! No such amendment was sought. Resort was had to the Hamiltonian doctrine that the Constitution created a nation with all the powers thereof. The dominant statesmen of that day held, as was subsequently held by the courts, that the United States was a sovereign nation, having and entitled to exercise all the powers of any sovereign nation, the right to make war and peace, the right to acquire territory, and, as a necessary consequence of that right, the right to govern it without limitation save in the discretion of the Congress. That is the law of the land to-day as applied with respect to our new possessions, so that not only was Mr. Jefferson not the author of the Louisiana purchase in the first instance, but the credit of having that great territory that we have to-day is due to the doctrines laid down by Alexander Hamilton in assertion of the nation's powers under the Constitution. [Applause on the Republican side.]

On January 13, 1803, Mr. Gallatin wrote to Mr. Jefferson as to the Louisiana purchase:

> But does any constitutional objection really exist? To me, it would appear, first, that the United States as a nation have an inherent right to acquire territory; second, that whenever that acquisition is by treaty, the same constitutional authorities in whom the treaty-making power is vested have the constitutional right to sanction the acquisition.

The gentleman from New York is not content with eliminating from our national history every party but his own in general terms. He enters into further particulars. He says:

> The history of the last fifty years has been the enforcement reluctantly of Democratic policies by Republican politicians.

[Laughter.]

The policies of the last fifty years, what are they?

It is no exaggeration to say that they are writ large in the world's ledger, not as belonging to the United States alone, but as bearing on the destinies of mankind. Like some great mountain peak dominating the landscape, the most conspicuous of these policies is that which in simple terms told the bondman to go free—the emancipation proclamation of the Republican politician, Abraham Lincoln. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Was the enforcement of the national authority a Democratic policy—the giant war with its awful record of human sacrifice, enforced by the hundreds of thousands of men (were they Republican politicians), who in camp, on the battlefield, and in prison, laid down their lives a willing sacrifice that the Union might endure? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Were those Democratic policies whereby a broken and disrupted Union was reconstructed, and States whose relations with their sister States had been dissolved were again brought into harmonious relations, so that together they renewed their onward march under a common flag to a common destiny?

Were they Democratic policies which wrote into the Constitution the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments?

Was it Democratic policy that conferred on the black man of the South for the protection of his new-born freedom the right of suffrage?

Was that a Democratic policy which grasped anew the conception of Hamilton and in harmony therewith preserved our splendid credit both at home and abroad by the prompt payment of the national debt?

Was the establishment of the gold standard a Democratic policy? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Was the maintenance and extension and strengthening of our protective system a Democratic policy?

Were the policies Democratic that adapted our institutions to new and unprecedented conditions in carrying the civil government suitable to their needs, as well as peace and liberty and enlightenment to our new possessions in the Caribbean and in the Orient; or were they the policies of the Republican party, which has never found a problem in government, however new, that it was not able successfully to solve? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The last eleven years of Republican rule mark a new era in the history of the nation. They are crowded with achievements which have called for the highest type of constructive statesmanship. Both as to internal and external affairs they loom large in the domain of world politics. They remade the world's map. With the close of the Spanish war the United States bade farewell to all possible isolation and became an active participant in universal rule.

The war for the liberation of Cuba, hastened by the impetuosity of the Democratic party and a Republican contingent, found the nation but ill prepared to enter the contest. Lacking an organized army, lacking ammunition, lacking almost everything that should precede a campaign, President McKinley was forced to make the best of things, and he did; for no man will deny that when the war came he conducted it with an energy, a wisdom, and a discretion worthy the lofty title he bore of Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

With peace came Cuban independence and the redemption of our pledge that the war was for humanity and not for aggrandizement. The successful starting of Cuba on her career as a nation called for statesmanlike qualities of the highest order. Like qualities were again demanded upon the part of the Administration in power when we were compelled to take charge of the Cuban government upon failure of the Cuban people to adjust themselves to popular rule. As the liberator of Cuba and as her guardian all the world recognizes our disinterestedness, our fidelity to duty assumed, and our ability in the discharge of it.

Under Republican Administration Porto Rico has been started upon a career both of material prosperity and of intellectual and moral growth. Government has been provided for her not according to precedent, but as adapted to her conditions by the wisdom and ingenuity of Republican legislators.

The Philippines are rapidly advancing on their way in preparation for ultimate self-government. And this under Republican Administration by methods of Republican device, notwithstanding the cowardly suggestions of those who would abandon them to anarchy or plunder and the sneers of those who are as responsible for our possession of them as is the party in power.

Great contributions have been made to the maintenance of the world's peace. The blockade of Venezuela by foreign powers for the collection of debts was raised by the intervention of President Roosevelt and arbitration substituted for possible war.

In violation of all the precedents of diplomatic history, but pursuant to the dictates of humanity, President Roosevelt dared boldly to suggest the cessation of the bloody war between Russia and Japan, and as a result of his efforts brought about a treaty of peace. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And I doubt not that when his name and memory shall be the subject of men's charitable speeches, in foreign nations and the next age, not the least of his claims to a lasting place in the world's memory will be under the title of "the great pacificator." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Not so conspicuous, but no less bold and philanthropic, was his action in laying his hand on the great anthracite coal strike and rescuing our people from a calamity incapable of measurement.

It remained for a Republican Administration to enter upon the realization of the world's dream of three hundred years; the most audacious conception of engineering genius ever known, the project to connect by friendly currents, to carry the world's commerce, the waters of two oceans alien to each other since the morning stars sang together.

The Panama Canal, long discussed, was halted for half a century by the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which gave to Great Britain the right of joint control with us, and by the ill-fated and unsuccessful French attempt at construction.

The abrogation of this treaty, the negotiations with Colombia and with Panama, and the recognition of the independence of the latter, the final treaty whereby we acquired the Canal Zone and the right to enter upon the great enterprise, constitute so many chapters in the life of that great diplomat, the friend and pupil of Lincoln, John Hay. [Applause on the Republican side.] A diplomat who gave the lie to the maxim of Talleyrand that the office of language is to conceal thought and taught the world that truth is as essential and potential in international diplomacy as in the domain of private contract. [Renewed applause.] An author whose pen was as graceful as that of Addison, as sweetly sympathetic as that of Burns, and as virile and incisive as that of Junius. One who, with almost the modesty and sensitiveness of a woman, combined the robust fiber of the manliest of men, an object at once of both admiration and love. [Loud and long-continued applause on the Republican side.]

There are questions of a domestic nature with which the Republican party has been called upon to deal during the last eleven years, to which it has given attention, which have become embodied in legislation. I must deal with them only briefly.

We are living in an age the economic law of which is combination; a law which is the evolution of changing industrial conditions. Enterprise has outgrown the partnership, has outgrown the corporation, and seeks the aggregation of corporations. Combined wealth, so essential to the colossal enterprises of our time, is accompanied by its evils, and they can be met and curbed only by the strong arm of the law. I want to contrast very briefly the record of the Republican and Democratic parties with respect to antitrust legislation and its enforcement. The Fiftieth Congress, a Democratic Congress, presided over by that distinguished statesman, John G. Carlisle, twenty years ago, specially charged one of its committees with an investigation of trusts and instructed it to report a remedy.

That committee met and organized, took a great deal of testimony—hundreds of pages, I think—and then they made this report. I will only read a sentence or two of it:

They respectfully report that the number of combinations and trusts formed and forming in this country is, as your committee has ascertained, very large, and affects a large portion of the important manufacturing and industrial interests of the country. They do not report any list of these combinations, for the reason that new ones are constantly forming and that old ones are constantly extending their relations so as to cover new branches of business and invade new territories.

Your committee further report that, owing to the present differences of opinion between the members of the committee, they limit this report to submitting to the careful consideration of subsequent Congresses the facts shown by the testimony taken before the committee.

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The succeeding Congress was a Republican Congress, and it enacted the Sherman antitrust law. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] The New York World, a Democratic newspaper, in an article entitled "Facts," tersely recited in part the history of that law, as follows:

The antitrust law was framed by a Republican, was passed by a Republican House and a Republican Senate, was signed by a Republican President.

The law remained a dead letter on the statute books during the entire second term of Grover Cleveland, a Democratic President.

Through those four years of Democratic Administration all appeals and all efforts of the World to have the law enforced were met with sneers, jeers, and open contempt from a Democratic Attorney-General, Richard Olney, who pretended that the law was unconstitutional, and who would do nothing toward prosecuting violators of it.

The first effort to enforce the law was made by Theodore Roosevelt, a Republican President.

The first Attorney-General to vigorously prosecute offenders and to test the law was a Republican Attorney-General, PHILANDER C. KNOX.

The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States given as a finality from which there is no appeal, upholding the law as perfectly constitutional and absolutely impregnable in every respect, as the World for twelve years constantly insisted, was due to five judges, every one of whom is a Republican.

The dissenting minority of the court included every Democratic judge of the tribunal, to wit, Chief Justice Fuller, of Illinois; Mr. Justice White, of Louisiana, and Mr. Justice Peckham, of New York.

[Renewed applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Before the gentleman starts on another subject or pursues this, I desire to yield to him the remaining thirty minutes of my time. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Of course I would not be understood to insinuate that any of these justices of the Supreme Court were influenced by party consideration, but their action simply illustrates how impossible it is to get rid of early habits. [Laughter.]

But it was not Mr. Cleveland's Attorney-General alone who refused to believe that there was any efficacy in the Sherman antitrust law. Mr. Cleveland himself, in his last message to Congress, in 1896, said:

Though Congress has attempted to deal with this matter by legislation, the laws passed for that purpose thus far have proved ineffective, not because of any lack of disposition or attempt to enforce them, but simply because the laws themselves, as interpreted by the courts, do not reach the difficulty. If the insufficiencies of existing laws can be remedied by further legislation, it should be done. The fact must be recognized, however, that all Federal legislation on this subject may fall short of its purpose because of inherent obstacles, and also because of the complex character of our governmental system, which, while making Federal authority supreme within its sphere, has carefully limited that sphere by metes and bounds that can not be transgressed.

Now, then, over and against the opinion of Mr. Cleveland and his Attorney-General I want to place what Attorney-General KNOX said in his speech before the Chamber of Commerce in Pittsburg, on October 14, 1902:

If the Sherman Act exhausts the power of Congress over monopolies, the American people find themselves hopelessly impotent, facing a situation fraught with the most alarming possibilities with which neither the Federal nor the State governments can deal.

Can it be possible that the people of the United States, feeling the pressure of undoubted evils, are nevertheless totally powerless? Is it true that although they know the nature of the wrong and are seeking a remedy, the Constitution, as it stands, does not permit them to pursue it; that amendment to that charter is first necessary; that the power of Congress does not now extend over detriments injuring the entire body of citizens in their most vital concerns, because these detriments originate in the States? I do not believe we find ourselves so helpless. When the currents of monopoly evil flow out over State lines and cover the country, not only entering but largely filling the channels of interstate and foreign trade, it will not do to say that the evil is beyond the national reach.

It would seem monstrous to urge that Congress and the Executive under its authority are powerless and must sit idly by and see the channels of interstate commerce made use of to the injury of the people by monopolistic combinations.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Without stopping to cite in detail the numerous cases which, under Republican Administrations, have, by their successful results, demonstrated the virtue of Republican legislation against trusts and monopolies, I will satisfy myself with quoting this summary from the report of Attorney-General KNOX. Speaking of these cases, he says:

Here, then, are four phases of the attack on the combination in restraint of trade and commerce—the railroad injunction suits, the cotton-pool cases, and the Northern Securities case. The first relates to the monopoly produced by secret and preferential rates for railroad transportation; the second to railroad traffic pooling; the third to a combination of independent corporations to fix and maintain extortionate prices for meats, and the fourth to a corporation organized to merge into itself the control of parallel and competing lines of railroad and to eliminate competition in their rates of transportation.

Kindred to trust evils are transportation evils—discriminations, rebates, and like devices. To meet these, the Interstate Commerce Commission was created more than twenty years ago by Republican legislation. From time to time its powers have been increased, and at the last Congress what was known as the "railroad-rate bill" was passed, empowering the Commission amongst other things to pass upon the question of reasonable rates.

This record of fidelity to party pledges on the part of the Republican party and of efficiency in things accomplished will appeal to the confidence of the people in spite of the carping criticism and unreasonable fault-finding of the Democratic party, which, when in power, did nothing to carry into effect the law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Materially speaking the last two Republican Administrations mark the most prosperous period in our history. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And I say to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], whom I do not see here, but who made a most admirable speech yesterday, that I have no new speech to write, no new song to sing. I am still preaching prosperity under Republican administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] I will say something about the panic in a few moments. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OLMSTED. They always applaud a panic.

Mr. DALZELL. I think we are hearing from our friends on the other side who rely on calamities. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Now, I say that the last ten years of Republican administration have been the most prosperous in our history, and I am going to prove it.

Observe for just a moment the figures that prove my assertion. Take first the magnificent figures that represent our internal commerce. By internal commerce I mean the business that we do among ourselves in our States and Territories. I mean the free and unrestricted trade on railroad and river, on the Lakes and the Gulf, and along our seaboard, in and between forty-six great Commonwealths and our outlying possessions. That commerce is estimated to equal the enormous sum of $40,000,000 and that is double the aggregate of foreign commerce of all the other nations of the world besides. Think of it. If we bought and sold not a dollar's worth outside of our own domain, we would still be doing a business beside which the aggregate foreign trade of Germany and France and Great Britain, of Russia, China, and Japan would measure up only one-half.

We hear a great deal about the necessity for foreign trade, the desirability of conquering foreign markets, and I would not belittle that necessity nor deny that desirability; but let us never forget that the greatest market in the world, the most desirable, that most essential to our well-being and advancement and to our independence, is the great, unequaled American home market. [Applause on the Republican side.] And let us not forget either that the policy which has furnished to us and preserved that market is the policy that plants the factory beside the farm, the policy that protects every home industry. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In considering our internal commerce let it be remembered that we have more money in circulation than we ever had before. In the last five years it has increased sixty-eight and three-quarter millions of dollars. We have more national-bank capital than we ever had before. In the last five years it has increased over $24,000,000.

Our people have more money in savings banks than they ever had before. Savings bank deposits have increased in the last five years over $174,000,000 [applause], and the total of our bank deposits of every kind has increased one billion two hundred and fifty millions. We have an available cash balance in the Treasury of over $260,000,000. [Applause.]

Now, how about the other branch of our commerce—our foreign trade?

Last year our exports and imports, for the first time in our history, reached the astounding figure of $3,000,000,000. Three billions of dollars! And that is three hundred and thirty-four millions more than the total of our exports and imports of the preceding year. It is about one and a third billions more than during the best year of the Cleveland Administration. During the first year of that Administration the balance of trade was against us nearly $19,000,000.

Last year the balance of trade in our favor was over $517,000,000.

During the last ten years of Republican administration the balance of trade in our favor equals ten times the aggregate balances of trade of all the years from George Washington to Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is only within the last few years that we have become to any large extent exporters of manufactures, and yet last year these exports reached the sum of $600,000,000. And that was an increase over the preceding year of nearly $60,000,000.

Agricultural exports increased more than twice that much, or over $148,000,000. Together, year by year, they grow, the exports of manufactures and of agriculture. The one aids the other. New factories make new markets and new markets develop new farms, and the protective policy of the Republican party nourishes both. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And in this connection let me impress on you this important fact, that we are now the first of exporting nations. In 1865 four great nations were struggling for the world's export trade—Great Britain, France, Germany, and the United States. Great Britain stood first and the United States stood fourth. In 1885 Great Britain stood first and the United States stood third. In 1895 Great Britain still stood first and the United States stood second. In 1903, under a Republican Administration, the United States marched past Great Britain and took her place as first in rank. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And while it is true that only the comparatively insignificant amount of 5 per cent of our total production is exported, it is also true that we are year by year making further inroads into the world's markets, and that there are few places into which American enterprise has not penetrated. We are selling our products in Canada, in Germany, in France, in Great Britain, in Russia, and in the Far East.

Under the operation of the protective policy we have grown to be the greatest of manufacturing nations. [Applause.]

Let me show you what strides we have been making. In 1890 we had invested in this country in manufactures six billion five hundred and twenty millions and upward of capital; last year, only seventeen years later, we had invested over thirteen billions, or nearly twice as much, an astonishing growth in seventeen years.

In 1890 the value of our output of manufactures was over $9,000,000,000; last year it was nearly $15,000,000,000. In 1890 the number of wage-earners was four and a half millions; last year the number was nearly six millions. In 1890 the wages paid were one billion eight hundred and ninety millions and upward; last year the wages paid amounted to two billions six hundred and sixty millions and upward.

And yet notwithstanding this wonderful prosperity which, if not contributed to by, is at least coincident with, our existing tariff laws, there is a demand from some quarters for their revision. Upon that subject I shall say only a few words, and mainly for the purpose of setting at rest any doubts that my friend from Missouri may have as to my attitude. [Laughter.]

Personally, I do not believe that there is any necessity for a general revision of our tariff laws. [Applause on the Republican side.] I believe, however, that it is well to recognize the claims of those who think there should be some revision, and I am inclined to believe that unless there should be a change of sentiment in the meantime the Republican convention when it meets next June will promise that the subject shall be considered. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the Republican party shall prevail in the next election, I believe the tariff will be revised at a special session of Congress following immediately upon the inauguration of the President.

When revised, it will be revised in strict accordance with the Republican theory of protection, so as to furnish adequate protection to every American industry and to the wage of every American workman. [Applause on the Republican side.] If there are now duties that are no longer needed for protection, they will be reduced or dispensed with. If there be places where such protection as I have described does not now exist, either by reason of the absence of duties or by reason of their being too low, in the one case duties will be added and in the other case they will be increased. [Applause on the Republican side.] In other words, the tariff will be revised up or down as may be necessary to make it really protective. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the choir is not ready to strike forth with the chorus—

> Sound the loud timbrel o'er land and o'er sea;
> DALZELL is converted, the country is free.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. To which I say amen.

I believe, furthermore, with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. PAYNE], that we need a maximum and minimum tariff in order to meet the conditions created by foreign nations which have such systems. The minimum tariff must be protective [applause on the Republican side], the maximum tariff will be in excess of that. The two will be so adjusted as to compel our entrance into foreign markets on as favorable terms as are given any other nations. [Applause on the Republican side.]

There will in no event be any tariff commission. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.] The men who made the Constitution intrusted to the representatives of the people, elected every two years, the exclusive prerogative of initiating revenue measures. During all our history the House of Representatives has jealously guarded that prerogative, never surrendered it, and, both Democratic and Republican Representatives in this respect standing on a common platform, never will. [Applause.]

What would happen to the tariff if a Democratic House of Representatives should be elected God only knows. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Past experience of Democratic legislation on the subject of tariff does not afford us much hope.

And there may be danger. My friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] the other day marched gallantly up to the performance of his biennial task, and elected a Democratic House of Representatives. [Laughter on the Republican side.] He always does it at this season of the year. The time may vary a little, a few days, or a few weeks; it may be amid the chill blasts of winter or amid the flowers that bloom in the spring, but it is always before the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November. The gentleman is persistent as well as prophetic. He is not red-headed, but he is hopeful, and has never forgotten his boyhood lesson, "If at first you don't succeed, try, try again." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

If any such calamity as the election of a Democratic House of Representatives should be visited upon our people, I sincerely hope my friend from Missouri will be its Speaker. [Prolonged applause.] I should enjoy beyond all things to see the smile spread over his Roman countenance while his colleague from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] denounces him as an autocrat [prolonged laughter on the Republican side] and embalms in the RECORD from day to day what he does not know about the rules of the House.

Now, we have had a panic, and gentlemen on the other side of the House seem to enjoy and to gloat over it. My friend from Missouri and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] yesterday taunted us on account of it, saying that it was a Republican panic. Well, it was not a Republican panic nor a party panic of any kind. Declamation will not fix the panic upon the Republican party or upon any party. If you gentlemen expect to satisfy the country that this is a Republican panic, the burden is on you to show the connection of that panic with some Republican act, either upon the part of the Executive or upon the part of Congress. You can not do either. First and foremost, it will be necessary that you demonstrate that it is a United States panic. Now, I assert that it is not a United States panic, but a panic that prevails the world over, and I am going to repeat the reading to-day of what my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] put into the RECORD yesterday:

LONDON WORKHOUSES FULL—MANY INFIRM PAUPERS BOARDING AT SANITARIUMS AT THE SEASIDE.

LONDON, January 29, 1908.

Inquiries throughout Great Britain show that lack of employment is responsible for acute distress in many towns, the trades most affected being building, engineering, and shipbuilding.

Owing apparently to the slackness of trade, the forty workhouses of Greater London are filled to overflowing. The latest returns show that in these workhouses there are 80,183 boarders, and that 45,821 people are receiving outdoor relief. This gives a ratio of 26.5 paupers to the thousand of the population.

It is impossible to grant all the applications for admittance to these institutions.

So that the panic which we had and from which we are yet suffering somewhat is not a United States panic exclusively, but a panic that is world-wide in its effects. So far as the United States is concerned, I take it that it is a prosperity panic. I will read you what the Comptroller of the Currency says:

Certainly since as long ago as the date of the San Francisco catastrophe there has been no lack of warning indications of financial troubles and possible business disaster. For at least ten or twelve years there has been an era of advancing prices and great industrial, commercial, and speculative activity in all the countries in the world. Credits have increased and multiplied until the limit has been reached in the amount of the reserve money on which they must be based.

For at least two or three years, however, it has been becoming more and more evident that there must soon be a slackening of pace if we were to avoid a general and universal crisis in financial and commercial affairs. These conditions have been world-wide and not by any means confined to the United States. Crises of more or less severity have arisen in several important countries.

Now, that being the condition of things, all at once the country was made aware of great evils in business management. We had the insurance scandals, we had the railroad deals, we had lights turned on the methods of high finance, we had the light turned on the speculations by the copper syndicate and other syndicates, and the immense amounts of water in capital stock, and the very moment that these things came into the public view the breath of suspicion became manifest and the crisis came.

You say that it is a Republican panic because we said that the panic of 1893 was a Democratic panic, but there is no analogy between the present panic and the panic of 1893. That panic came in with a Democratic Administration, stayed with a Democratic Administration, went out with a Democratic Administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] Why, we have been eleven years——

Mr. GARRETT. Can you state with what Administration this panic will go out?

Mr. DALZELL. I am sorry I can not, but I think very soon under a Republican Administration.

Mr. GARRETT. It will go out with the Republican Administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. It will never go out with a Democratic Administration, because there will be no Democratic Administration. Whether the panic be on the way to improvement now or not, the people of this country will never seek relief by electing to office a party that is unsound on all the principles that lie at the base of good government, sound money and the protective tariff. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] Do you suppose, in the present condition of things, the people of this country are going to call into power the Democratic party, in view of its history in the past with respect to all the important legislation necessary to relief from the present condition of things? Certainly not.

I repeat, there is no analogy between this panic and the panic of 1893. That ensued from a lack of confidence in measures, this from a lack of confidence in men. Then the National Treasury was empty, now it is full to overflowing. Then bonds were issued to pay current expenses. The late bond issue was to furnish the currency the people needed. Then the balance of trade was against us, we owed foreigners; now the balance of trade is in our favor, foreigners owe us.

The most remarkable thing about the whole situation is the suddenness with which the crisis passed. That constitutes the most convincing evidence of the really prosperous condition of the country. We are now in the aftermath, but things are improving. Men are gradually being restored to work. There are no unemployed that can not readily be cared for. There are no bank failures to speak of, no savings bank or trust company failures to speak of. There are no railroads in the hands of receivers.

In my judgment, our return to normal conditions is not very far off. Whether there be necessity for currency legislation I do not pretend to know. I am in doubt. But one thing I do know, and that is that the people of this country will never trust currency legislation to a party which has in turn advocated repudiation of the national debt, fiat money, and the making of forty cents of silver a dollar by law.

The gentleman from Missouri, in the beautiful peroration in which he closed his address, called upon his Democratic brethren to rally in support of the principles of the Democratic party. The gentleman did not intend to be humorous, but he was. The Democratic party has no principles that can be identified. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Even on such a well-defined issue as the tariff it is unprincipled. In the Jackson campaign of 1832 it was for "an adequate protection to American industry." In 1848 it was for free trade. In 1868 it was for a revenue tariff with incidental protection. In 1872 it trailed along under the banner of Horace Greeley, the prince of American protectionists. In 1904 it declared protection to be robbery.

Democratic principles indeed! What are they now?

They are all embodied in the "Peerless." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] He still believes in the free coinage of silver at the ratio of sixteen to one without the cooperation of any other nation. He believes in the government ownership of railroads. He believes in the initiative and referendum. He believes in invading the rights of the States by passing a Federal child labor law. How many other crank notions he believes in only time will tell.

You believe in him, and I am only sorry that there is even a suspicion of a difference in your ranks. The gentleman from New Jersey voiced it the other day. The Virginia Democratic Association, at a meeting in this city in October last, voiced it in a preamble and resolution which were published in the Washington Post. I will read as follows:

Whereas William Jennings Bryan, the great commoner, as well as the great uncommoner; the great advocate of free silver; the great advocate of government ownership of railroads; the great advocate of initiative and referendum; the greatest blower upon earth; the greatest standing candidate upon earth; the greatest man without a record known in American politics is threatening again to become a candidate of the Democratic party for the Presidency of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this association that he stands about as much show of success as a short-tailed bull in fly time.

[Loud and continued laughter and applause.]

Gentlemen, you may have dissensions in your ranks; there is no dissension in ours. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] I will get two cheers for that, one in advance, and will get another when I get through. We are unanimously in favor of the nomination at the Denver convention as Democratic candidate for the Presidency of the great commoner and the great uncommoner, William Jennings Bryan. [Applause.]

The Republican party has many candidates from whom to choose a President of the United States. It has only one set of principles. They are consistent with each other; they have been written in our platforms, and redeemed in legislation; they are embodied in the wise enactments of the last half century; they are progressive, meeting and solving problems as they arise. The principles of the Republican party come down to us through all the years of our history illustrated in the great measures which have contributed to our national glory and to the strength and permanency of free institutions. Through successive administrations their wisdom has been vindicated, and they will receive a new vindication and indorsement when the people speak in November next. [Loud and continued applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Having exhausted my time, I hope the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] will now proceed.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD]. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, after listening to the splendid oration of the brilliant oracle of the now silent smokestacks of Pittsburg [Mr. DALZELL], I fear the House is in no mood to hear a nonpartisan speech strictly on patriotic lines.

I am here to-day, a plain, blunt old soldier, to speak a few words for 175,000 veterans of the civil war. I have before me some of the petitions that I have received from these old soldiers in favor of the bill that I had the honor to introduce, giving to every veteran who served eighteen months at the front $1 per day. This movement is the most formidable movement among veterans since the close of the war. There never has been any movement like it. It is a spontaneous movement of the old soldiers without any organization whatever. This is the only measure that takes care of the veteran soldiers. All other bills that have been enacted by Congress were passed through committees appointed by the Grand Army of the Republic operating through committees of Congress. This bill is not a political pension bill. It is a bill that recognizes only service and merit. Because this bill did not originate with the Grand Army as a national organization, a week ago last Wednesday the National Tribune, of Washington, D. C., published the following:

That all petitions, resolutions, and memorials by posts in regard to pension legislation be required to be forwarded to national headquarters through the department headquarters, and that posts be forbidden to make separate and independent application to Congress for legislation upon the subject of pensions.

This is an extract from general orders, republished, as I learn, either by request or at the solicitation of the commander in chief. This resolution was evidently republished for the purpose of stopping these soldier petitions being sent direct to Congressmen. I have the responses from the veterans as to that resolution. Here are some that I have not had time to tabulate since that order was issued [pointing to a stack on the desk]. Here is a resolution received to-day from a post at Gallipolis, Ohio, one of the strong posts of that State. The date is February 23, 1908, and is as follows:

At a regular meeting of Cadot Post, G. A. R., last night, the action taken by the national officers, and especially Commander in Chief Burton, in trying to defeat your dollar-a-day pension bill in Congress was discussed and heartily and unanimously condemned, while the stand you have taken is heartily indorsed, with the hope that you will succeed, notwithstanding the bill was not indorsed at the national encampment. I write this by instruction of our post.

Very respectfully, A. W. LANGLEY, Post Adjutant.

It is unparalleled in the history of this fraternal organization known as the Grand Army of the Republic to defy the commander in chief, but everywhere the same spirit is shown, mingled with intense feeling. Never before in the entire history of this great order of fraternity and patriotism, covering a period of forty-two years, has the commander in chief been unanimously condemned by a post of the Grand Army.

I do not envy either the heart or conscience or patriotism of any soldier of the civil war, be he private or commander, who will use his high office to defeat a measure of such conceded justice as this veterans' pension bill. It is true, it did not originate in a national encampment, but that is a matter of form only. As the head of the greatest fraternal order of valor and patriotism since the birth of history it seems to me, and I have been a member of the Grand Army from its birth up to this hour, that the commander in chief should have allowed the "old boys" of '61 to '65 the right of direct petition, at least.

I have labored side by side for the past six months with these old veterans, with whom I touched elbows at the front for four terrible years, to create patriotic sentiment for this bill. And now, when it has already received favorable consideration by a majority vote of the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, to have this high official, who, above all others, should stand for justice and equity for these brave and constant soldiers, attempt to cripple our efforts for relief, has overwhelmed me with disappointment. And if this great measure of grateful succor to the comrades is killed in this Congress the old veterans will know where to fix a part, at least, of the responsibility. I carried a gun the first year of the war (a part of the time at $11 a month), and I know the rank and file. This battle for justice and equity will go on, and I propose to stay in this fight as long as I have endurance to strive. I believe there are millions of patriotic men and women in this country who will join in this final struggle to see to it that this sad remnant of the great battalions of liberty and emancipation shall have their last days on earth made comfortable and pleasant.

I desire to call the attention of the Members of the House to this fact, that this bill can be passed by this Congress without taking a single additional dollar of money out of the United States Treasury, simply by reducing the appropriations for the Army in the bill now pending before this House, and by mustering out in accordance with a bill introduced by the minority leader [Mr. WILLIAMS] all of the Regular Army down to 35,000 men; and 35,000 is enough, if not 10,000 too many. That will save $20,000,000, and this pension bill will only take about $17,500,000 the first year and 15 per cent less every year for nine years, when the veterans who belong to the older class of soldiers will practically all be gone. You can do it also by stopping the construction of two more of the useless battle ships that are to cost $20,000,000. You can do it twice over by reducing the large appropriation for a standing army to maintain a government of force in the Philippine Islands. You can do it three times over by reducing the enormous appropriations for continuing the work on the Panama Canal, a project now liable to prove the most expensive failure in all the centuries. The projected lock canal is pronounced impracticable by the most capable engineers of England, France, Germany, and the United States.

Hence I am on solid ground when I make the statement that if you pass this bill you can do it without impairing the efficiency of the Government in the least. This will give these 175,000 worthy veterans a dollar a day pension and enable them to spend their last days in comfort and repose.

I have here petitions from the veterans of all the so-called Soldiers' Homes. It is costing, as near as I can estimate now, with the pensions that the Government is paying to the soldiers, who are the inmates of these homes, anywhere from four to ten hundred dollars each a year. At Battle Mountain, in South Dakota—the Battle Mountain Sanitarium—as I learn, it is costing over a thousand dollars a year for every soldier in that institution, and the plant and buildings have cost the Government already about $1,000,000.

Here is a petition signed by 236 veterans of the Iowa Soldiers' Home at Marshalltown, Iowa, every one of whom, if you will give him a dollar a day, will leave that so-called military prison and go home to his family and the friends of his young manhood. Here is a petition signed by 240 of the Pacific Branch, National Soldiers' Home at Santa Monica, Cal. Here is a petition signed by 50 in the National Home at Bath, Me. Here is a petition signed by 350 soldiers at Marion, Ind. Here is a petition signed by 290 soldiers of the Michigan Soldiers' Home. Here is a petition signed by 260 of the Illinois Soldiers' Home. Here is a petition signed by a number (not given) of the Soldiers' Home in Kansas. Here is one signed by 78 veterans of the Soldiers' Home at St. Joseph, Mo. Here is a petition signed by 640 veterans of the Soldiers' Home at Hampton, Va. Here is a petition signed by 100 of the Soldiers' Home at Chelsea, Mass. Here is a petition signed by 33 in the Soldiers' Home at Bennington, Vt. Here is a petition signed by 560 in the National Soldiers' Home of Tennessee. All of the above named are field-service veterans of the civil war. What they say in these petitions is, that if Congress will pass my $1 a day pension bill—

We will be enabled to return to our early homes and friends and spend the few remaining years vouchsafed us as befit soldiers.

Here is another petition signed by 67 of the Indiana Soldiers' Home.

I have here lists of the veteran associations outside of the Grand Army that have sent me petitions. There are about 600 of these associations represented. Here is a letter received this morning from the Union Veterans' Legion of Columbus, Ohio, in which they state that the Union Veterans' Legion has unanimously, after a full debate, indorsed this bill, that a movement will be made to call the attention of Representative Lyberger in the House, and Captain Moffatt in the Senate, to get a joint resolution passed in the Ohio legislature in favor of the bill.

Here is a voice from the Soldiers' Home at Washington, District of Columbia, which I will ask the clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

U. S. SOLDIERS' HOME,
Washington, D. C., February 22, 1908.

Gen. I. R. SHERWOOD.

DEAR SIR: Allow me to congratulate you on the able speech delivered by you in behalf of the old veterans.

Your bill is the only real one that has ever been presented to the Congress and I hope it will have the hearty support of that honorable body.

I myself have been a member of these so-called national soldiers' homes and I must say they are not what people think they are. In fact they are anything but a home for the poor old veteran. [Applause.]

The nation is paying $100 per man to every State home in the country and I hope you will oppose this to the bitter end, for I consider it nothing but graft, pure and simple, for the poor old veteran gets little or no benefit from it.

You are simply asking for justice long delayed and I consider your bill will be a saving of millions to the Government.

Let the poor old veteran die in peace in his own home, as your bill provides and he will never cease to thank you until the end of his days.

Yours, sincerely, JAMES MCKENNA, late U. S. A.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that nearly all the Republicans when this patriotic question is up, involving the vital interests of 175,000 veteran soldiers, have left their seats. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I remember when I was here thirty-four years ago, as a Member of Congress, that when a Member arose to discuss the interests of the veterans of the war they all "sat up and took notice." Is it possible that patriotism is dead on that side of the House? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Here is a voice from Michigan, a voice that is the average opinion of the veterans of that State on this question. Let the Clerk read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FRANKFORT, MICH., February 22, 1908.

Gen. I. R. SHERWOOD.

HONORABLE SIR: Many thanks for the copy of your bill No. 7625. The "old boys" around here feel that they can count on you as a friend indeed. I can not see why a majority of the Members should oppose this bill. Why, take into consideration the good it would do not only to the old soldiers, but to the country at large. Take any of the members from the smaller cities and see the amount of money they would have scattered in their home districts every quarter, and every one would benefit. I am told that England spends more money on public improvements during panics and hard times in order to give work and pay out her moneys when they are needed. They do not retrench when her people need help. The large corporations would naturally oppose your bill—it would increase their taxes and not benefit them—but they can afford it. They have become rich off the country the "old boys" saved for them.

God knows, the most of the "old boys" need it. The very ones who are not getting enough. I know several who come in under the McCumber act who are drawing their $15 per that were drafted in the spring of '65, and Lee surrendered before they ever left their own State, and those from New York received $300 bounty beside. But I do not want to bore you.

Fraternally, yours, E. Z. GUILD.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Here is a prolific voice from old Kentucky, giving the average sentiment of the soldiers from the Blue Grass State:

PEBWORTH, KY., February 21, 1908.

Hon. I. R. SHERWOOD, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I thank you for your noble and heartfelt speech for the old veterans who carried the banner with the stars to final victory. We old boys in the eastern part of Kentucky will long remember the name of Isaac R. Sherwood, because you are a just man. I can tell you with assurance that our Member of Congress, John W. Langley, will give you help.

I am now getting old, and the "cucumber" bill does not help me. I have tried to multiply the earth with good children, as I have nine boys, and they are all of the same grit that I am. I have resided in the log cabin over twenty-four years. All my sons are living and each has a sister apiece. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Sherwood, pass your bill, as before next winter many of us old boys will have crossed the dark river.

MILTON H. SMITH,
Eighth Kentucky Infantry, Pebworth, Ky.

I want to explain what is meant by the "cucumber bill." This refers to the McCumber bill, which gives a soldier a pension on account of his age. The boys out in the bushes are calling the McCumber bill the "cucumber bill," because it takes care of the green soldiers, but does nothing substantial for the veterans.

Here is a sad voice from Oklahoma, which expresses the sentiments of the veterans of that virgin State:

MIAMI, OKLA., January 15, 1908.

General I. R. SHERWOOD, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please find inclosed petition asking for the passage of the $1.00 a day pension bill introduced by you.

I regard it as the only just bill that has been before Congress for the men that actually put down the rebellion.

I enlisted in '61 in a regiment that traveled 9,000 miles during the war, and marched 4,500 miles of the 9,000, and went through all the campaigns that the Army of the Tennessee participated in, and now there are thousands of men in my native State (Ohio) that served 100 days and never left the State that are drawing as much or more pension than I am getting. O, consistency, thou art a jewel.

Sincerely, yours.

R. M. J. SHRIVER,
Adjutant, J. B. McPherson Post No. 11.

Here is a potent voice from Pennsylvania. I have received five thousand letters of this tenor from old soldiers, from Maine to Oregon, during the past sixty days.

MERCERBURG, PA., February 9, 1908.

DEAR SIR: You will find inclosed a petition of old soldiers of the civil war. These soldiers are in favor of your bill to give all of the old veterans $1.00 per day. There is no one on this petition but old veterans of the civil war. We want our Representative from this district to support your bill, the Hon. Benjamin K. Focht. He must support your bill or the old boys will remember him when he comes around for reelection again. There is a large vote in connection with this petition—their sons and relations.

I am yours with respect,

HENRY C. WOLFE,
Mercerburg, Franklin Co., Pa.

Here is a voice full of pathos and patriotism from Illinois:

ROSEMOND, ILL., February 20, 1908.

Hon. I. R. SHERWOOD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I want to say that you have a great big heart and it is in the right place. All the old veterans of this vicinity are saying "God bless you" and are praying that God may put it into the heart of every Representative in Congress to vote for your bill. Look at the picture of the battle of Gettysburg. There is not a man in Congress to-day that would stand in that shower of leaden hail ten minutes for Washington City and all that there is in it. We were getting then only $13 per month. Was it for honor? No, it was for love of country and the Union of the States.

We will be here a short time only. If the Government is going to help us it must do so quickly. I served four years two months and eighteen days, and I am proud of it. Am 67 years old and getting $12 per month pension. Am living in a little one-room house with an invalid daughter to take care of. Twelve dollars per month will not pay our doctor's bills. God knows that we have no income outside of my pension. Neither of us are fit to work. What will become of us?

Truly,

W. H. REID.

Here is a voice from Indiana, and it is worth hearing. Will the Clerk please read it? It tells the average sentiment of the old veterans of the Hoosier State.

The Clerk read as follows:

BLOOMFIELD, IND., February 5, 1908.

Hon. I. R. SHERWOOD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A short time ago I sent the names of 80 old soldiers to the Hon. John C. Chaney, of the Second Indiana Congressional district, to vote and work for the one-dollar-per-day pension bill. The old soldiers of my county ask me to say to you they are all for your bill. They think forty years is long enough to wait, while millions of dollars is being spent for army and war ships and the Panama Canal. If the Members of Congress couldn't live on $5,000 a year because living is so high, what do they expect the old soldier to do that has to live on $12 or $17 a month pension, and are all old and not able to work?

The last Congress voted themselves $2,500 more pay. They tell us to go to the soldiers' homes. Would they like to leave relatives and kind neighbors and go off to a soldiers' home and live under military rules, and be governed by some broken-down politician, or would they ask to be made comfortable at home in their last days, if they had given up from three to four years of their best manhood to save a Government that is great enough and rich enough to give them a comfortable pension?

You could not boast of your great Republican party to-day if the old soldiers of 1861 to 1865 had not made it. They told us to wait until the Government took care of the infant industries. Well, we have waited and saw these industries grow to be great giants and control the Government; and when the men behind the guns want a dollar a day pension they tell us it will break the Government up.

The time has come that there is no Republicanism or Democratism with the old soldier. We are standing up for our rights as we stood up behind the guns. The politician that thinks the old soldiers are not united will find out better on the 3d of next November if they turn down this dollar-a-day pension bill, for most all the old comrades have sons and sons-in-law who will vote as the old comrades tell them, regardless of politics. Thousands of voters that never were in the Army are coming to our rescue. They see we are poor and not able to work, and they know the promises that have been made us from year to year; and they know that millions are spent from year to year that will never do this Government any good, only to a favored few.

The old soldiers will all stand by you in your fight for your one-dollar-a-day bill. I am a Republican; but I say to you if they turn the old soldiers down in this Congress, I will vote the Democratic ticket, and I know of hundreds of other old soldiers that will do the same.

I was with Sherman through his Atlanta campaign, in all the battles with him, and was mustered out in 1865, at Washington, D. C. I am not able to work and have to live on $17 a month pension, and because I can't prove a disability to the extent of a foot or a hand off they turn me down.

Very respectfully,

ELI W. ADAMS.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. Here is a letter from the State of Colorado in favor of this bill. I understand the governor, who is the author of this petition, is a high-class scholar, a humanitarian, and the president of the University of Colorado. It is signed by Governor Buchtel, the lieutenant-governor, all the State officers, all the members of the supreme court of Colorado, and fifty of the highest-class citizens of that State.

I have here now seven great rolls of petitions, each 500 feet long, from soldiers who fought the battles of the war of the rebellion, and I call attention to the fact again that in this great historic Chamber, supposed to be a patriotic body, only a few Members on the other side are present in their seats when the old soldiers' interests are under consideration.

Mr. ASHBROOK. And the Democrats are about sixteen to one. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. Now these petitions were prepared by the old soldiers themselves in their humble homes. Some have twenty names, some have thirty, some have forty, and some have a hundred. There are only a few of these old stalwarts left in any locality. The great majority have gone to the other shore. I have strung these local petitions together, and I will ask my friends to assist me in unrolling only one of them. You can see they are all headed differently and all prepared at home. Many of them are on cheap paper, written by trembling hands in pencil. Many of them are written on both sides. No two are alike. This, you see, is only one of seven of these great petitions. It has been unrolled and stretches up the aisle here to the back of this Hall, around the railing, and back down another aisle, with an Independent Democrat from Ohio [SHERWOOD] at one end and a Jacksonian Democrat from Wisconsin [MURPHY] at the other. [Applause on the Democratic side.] On both sides of this petition are the names of the old veterans of the war, who fought the fiercest battles the world ever saw in the greatest war of all history. Lined along the aisle are Democratic Members who are anxious to vote for this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This petition and seven others like it bear the names of the men who enlisted under the call of Abraham Lincoln, whom we heard lauded to-day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. These are the heroes who made Abraham Lincoln great, and who unified this nation; men who went into the first battles of the war at Philippi and Laurel Mountain, and Carrick's Ford in West Virginia.

Some of them were with Grant at Fort Donelson. Others were at Shiloh. Thousands of them were under Rosecrans at Stone River. Thousands more were above the clouds with Joe Hooker at Lookout Mountain. Thousands were in that desperate struggle at Chickamauga, and thousands belonged to the army of the Trans-Mississippi in those great campaigns. Others lost their health in the swamps of the Chickahominy. Others were at Chancellorsville, and Seven Pines, and the great battles before Richmond.

Others stood in front of Hood's fierce battalions at Franklin, Tenn., that bleak November afternoon in 1864, where more men were killed in proportion to the number engaged than in any battle ever fought on either continent. Thousands of others were in the final charge at Nashville, in the last battle of the war west of the Allegheny Mountains. A battle of two days, fought on the snow-crowned earth, flecked with the rich, red blood of heroes.

Thousands more stood on Cemetery Hill with the gallant Hancock in the great battle of Gettysburg. Thousands and thousands of the old veterans on these petitions were with Sherman in the feathery fringe of the skirmish smoke from Rocky Face Mountain to Atlanta in that one hundred days of constant fight.

Some went up the slopes of Kenesaw Mountain in that wild, mad charge of the 27th of June, 1864; others were in the great battles around Atlanta, and thousands more were with Sherman at Raleigh, N. C., at the final surrender. Thousands were at Appomattox when the greatest and knightliest soldier of the Union met the greatest and knightliest soldier of the Confederacy. [Applause.]

They are worn and tired and grizzled now, and I am here as an old soldier, bent and battered and bronzed, to plead their cause. [Applause.]

Is it possible that my appeals for justice for these old veterans, who in their young manhood loved their country better than life, are falling on ears of lead and hearts of stone?

I am sad to learn that the old boys are faring badly now. Some hundreds have recently lost places in the Government service. I have a list of 47 of the First United States Volunteer Cavalry, known as the "Rough Riders" in the Cuban war, who have been awarded places of honor and profit by the Administration, while my comrades of the long ago have been turned out to frost-bitten grass and cold neglect like worn-out dray horses. Here is heart-breaking news from Cleveland, the rich Queen City of Ohio:

[By the Associated Press.]

Cleveland, Ohio, Feb. 27.—Dead from lack of proper food, Russell Page, a civil war veteran, decorated by Congress for valiant service at Fort Donelson, was found yesterday in bed at his home. While Page was dying his wife was vainly searching for work. Page, who was confined to his bed as the result of a wound received in the war, was too proud to ask for aid, as was his wife.

One of the most gallant of the old heroes of the civil war starved to death—too proud to beg. What a grateful boon $1 a day pension would have been to starving Russell Page. And yet I have been told quite recently on this floor that the old soldiers have had enough.

I claim that the Government of the United States is rich enough, and should be patriotic enough, to take good care of these old soldiers, not in charity, but as a patriotic duty.

Let me call your attention to an old law, passed when the nation was weak in men and money, but strong in faith and patriotism. Here it is:

If any person, whether officer or soldier, belonging to the militia of any State and called out into service of the United States be wounded or disabled while in actual service, he shall be taken care of and provided for at the public expense. (Sec. 1639, U. S. Rev. Stat., Aug., 1813.)

This law was signed by James Madison, President in 1813. James Madison was a member of the convention that framed our Constitution; one of the greatest of the students of free and representative government, and a leader in that wonderful array of prescient spirits who set the young Republic on its great career. The law just quoted was framed when liberty, justice, and equality were sweet words, grateful to every loyal heart. We had not then departed from the simplicity of Democratic government, and the almighty dollar did not hang in the halo above the sacred altars of patriotism.

I brought these petitions for my Republican friends to see. I had hoped that our valuable floor leader [Mr. PAYNE] on the other side, that heroic figure, the modern Moses, who is attempting to lead the distracted children of the "strenuous one" out of their wilderness of bondage [laughter], would be present. I hoped that he would be here and rise in his place with that Claude Melnotte voice and that Jack Falstaff waist and Wilkins Micawber smile [laughter] and say, after seeing these great petitions, the largest ever seen on this floor: "Gentlemen, I move that House bill 7625 be put on its passage."

We on this side would have helped the Republicans to pass the bill, and it would have made him the most popular man in the United States. If he wants to take the name of this bill, I will surrender it to him. I will never make a speech in public or say a word that I introduced such a bill. If he will stand up here and help pass this bill and rally the Republicans, it would make 175,000 humble soldier homes happy. They would rise up and call him blessed, and millions of patriotic American citizens would join in the acclaim. He would immediately become a prominent candidate for President, and I will guarantee that he would beat the hefty globe trotter from Ohio in the Chicago convention on the first ballot. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I now propose to fortify the statement I made at the outset that we can pass this bill and not take an additional dollar out of the Treasury of the United States over present appropriations. Militarism, which always means lax morals and reckless extravagance, is to-day running its usual mad riot in the United States. And it is time to call a halt.

One of the true prophets of human destiny, Count Tolstoi, of Russia, in his last great book entitled "The Slavery of Our Times," says:

Neither Parliament nor constitutional government makes a nation happy, great, or advanced, but the ideals for which they strive and the freedom necessary to obtain those ideals.

What are our ideals to-day in the United States, when in the midst of a panic and universal distress we send an immense fleet of war vessels to the Pacific, if not to teach the Republics of South America on the south Atlantic and south Pacific seas that we have abandonded the simple government of the fathers of the Republic for the military mirage of empire; that we are no longer a government of consent, resting upon patriotic love of country, but a military autocracy resting upon force—a big navy and a great standing army?

It is as true to-day as early in the last century when that greatest of Scotch-English essayists, Thomas Carlyle, said it—

A standing army means waste, depression, and moral decay. No nation can improve its morals or grow in strength when its bravest and best sons are year by year devoured in the army.

In a great little book, recently issued by Prof. J. H. McLaren, he says:

War is the universal blunder of the human race. The army is a libel upon Christian civilization. The easy victory over Spain has made America drunk with martial pride. And if present tendencies continue unopposed, the last objects to be seen upon this continent will be a sword, a canteen, a Krupp gun, and a skeleton.

New York clergymen have taken up the fight against greatly increasing the Navy as unnecessary and needlessly extravagant.

A protest signed by 250 ministers and bishops has been forwarded to Senators and Representatives at Washington voicing the objections of the clergymen.

Here is an extract from the president of the International Arbitration Committee, chairman Columbus Board of Trade:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, February 3, 1908.

MY DEAR GENERAL: The intelligent citizens of our powerful Republic (not made so by a large army or formidable navy) should seize this opportunity to lead the world in its efforts to get rid of the old method of attempted settlements of disputes by "trial by battle," substituting trials before courts and by international arbitration.

Our Republic should keep its standing army within the size of a necessary police force, the ordinary State constabulary and militia. All nations that act upon the idea that a large standing army and a large navy are the surest guaranties of peace are making a most expensive mistake. The history of the world testifies that large armies and navies are more apt to lead to war than to peace; that they do not settle the justice of a cause, but only prove the strength of the victors. Why, then, should our nation be spending about two-thirds of its income on its Army and Navy? Why should the call of the Army and Navy Departments for more men and more war vessels be granted? Why should so large a portion of the money of our people be spent upon the idea that in time of peace we must prepare for war? Let the other, the more Christian idea of "In time of peace, prepare to keep the peace" be the controlling motive and practice of our country. Let our country lead the world to see this better way.

W. A. MAHONY.

Justice Brewer, of the United States Supreme Court, voices the best thought of the age in a recent address. Here is a great jurist, ripe in experience, richly endowed mentally, and deep in all the sweet humanities.

I quote:

I have no hesitancy in saying that our nation is making a grave mistake in its effort to build up a monster navy. It is uncalled for. We don't need it. We are 3,000 miles from the nearest nation, and there is no danger of being molested.

The glory of this nation is not in its increase in armament, but in its present course of sweet peace.

Look at the criminal exploitation of militarism and imperialism in the Philippines. The late Republican United States Senator from Maryland, George L. Wellington, made this valuable public utterance in Baltimore January 23, 1908:

The Philippines have cost us already $800,000,000 in money and 20,000 lives. They have corrupted probably 50,000 men more who might have been useful citizens. They have made more difficult all our foreign relations. And what have we got in return? Nothing. Practically nothing. The trade with the islands, of which so much has been said, is practically nil.

Eight hundred millions of our hard earned tax money wasted, and worse than wasted, in the Philippines is not too high an estimate. The Anti-Imperialistic Society of Boston makes it still larger. Think of what continental beneficence this money would have shed in 175,000 veteran homes. It is enough to pay every surviving veteran of the civil war who served one year $1 per day for ten years.

Look at our pension list, resulting from the death and disabilities of soldiers in this cruel conquest, mounting higher every year on account of the deadly Philippine climate. Up to 1907 it amounted to within a fraction of $19,000,000. And what is our gain commercially? A mere fraction. According to official estimates, of the total of Philippine imports, amounting to $28,785,855 in 1906, there is credited to the United States only $5,155,359, leaving to the credit of other countries $23,630,496. Thus it will be seen the imports from the United States into the Philippines amount only to about 18 per cent of the total. In respect of the exports the figures show that of the total of $33,713,357 there must be credited to foreign countries $21,634,143, so that of the products exported from the Philippines the United States consumes nearly 40 per cent. Of the $30,000,000 worth of imports into the Philippine Islands probably 65 per cent is of a class produced in the United States, over 50 per cent being manufactures and 38 per cent articles of food and animals, rice being, however, included in the last-mentioned class. The market available in the Philippine Islands for products of the United States appears to be, therefore, at the present time, about 20 million dollars, and of this the United States now supplies about 5½ millions, leaving to our rivals—chiefly the United Kingdom, Germany, Spain, and Australasia—the remainder of the field. Of this Philippine market of over 30 million dollars' worth of merchandise the United States supplies but 18⅜ per cent, while in the Hawaiian Islands she supplies about 80 per cent, and in Porto Rico 90 per cent, of the total merchandise entering those islands. These figures prove that the United States is policing these islands for the benefit of foreign countries, which supply the largest proportion of the imports into the Philippines.

There are other reliable figures which show the United States to be largely behind other countries in the sale of goods to the Philippine Islands. Thus, of fresh beef, of which nearly half a million dollars' worth is imported annually, the entire supply is drawn from Australia and none from the United States; of lard only 10 per cent comes from the United States, the remainder from China; of condensed milk, of which $265,000 worth was imported in 1905, only about $98,750 worth was from the United States and $119,000 worth from the United Kingdom; of closely woven cotton cloths, of which the imports were 3½ million dollars in 1905, less than two-thirds of a million dollars' worth was from the United States, against two million dollars' worth from the United Kingdom, which buys raw cotton from the United States, manufactures it, and ships it to our islands, selling there over three times as much as the United States. Of the total imports of cotton and cotton manufactures into the Philippine Islands, which amounted in 1905 to $6,826,845, the United States supplied the pitiful amount of $866,098; United Kingdom, $3,344,478; Spain, $965,298; and the prices at which Australian meats are laid down in the Philippines being so low as to render competition from the United States impracticable, while large quantities of pork and lard are drawn from the still nearer market of China. Eight years ago that greatest of business men in the United States, Andrew Carnegie, with prophetic ken, predicted just what has happened to us in the Philippines when he said:

> The manufacturer of Germany, France or England, the farmer of Australia and of the Baltic provinces of Russia and of the Argentine reach the Philippines at about one-half the freight cost that the American farmer has to pay on his products or the American manufacturer upon manufactured articles. Landing American products in Manila upon equal terms with the agricultural products of Australia, India, Argentina or of the manufactures of Europe simply means that American products are at so great a disadvantage, owing to the greater distance, that they are practically excluded from the new possessions.

With the accuracy of verity this prophecy of the great steel king has proved true. Had we a statesman to-day in the White House of commanding ability and moral courage, and a Congress in accord, we would give the unhappy Filipinos their immediate liberation to take their true orbit in the areas of the tropical Orient. The two representative native Filipinos in this Congress ask this boon for their bayonet-ruled people. Besides an intolerable burden, the Philippine Islands are a constant menace to national peace. And what will the verdict of history be on this exploitation of alien races in the Philippine Islands? We can write it now with unerring accuracy.

WE PAID THE BOY KING ALFONSO TWENTY MILLIONS FOR A TABLET UPON WHICH TO WRITE THE EPITAPH OF THE REPUBLIC OF GEORGE WASHINGTON AND THOMAS JEFFERSON AND ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

A body of patriotic Americans celebrated February 22, Washington's Birthday, in London. The Hon. R. Newton Crane, a high-class scholar and experienced diplomat, in a speech expressed strong disapproval of the voyage of the American fleet to the Pacific, and said that he feared when it reached San Francisco it would excite passion which might result in war.

How many millions of dollars of the people's hard-earned tax money will be burned up in cannon shots and smoke and fizz in this criminal continental folly no one in Washington seems to know; but already we know enough to know that the millions, worse than wasted in this ill-timed cruise, would have enabled the Government to have paid every veteran of the civil war $1 per day for a whole year—money that would have shed a wholesome and grateful beneficence in 175,000 patriotic homes. If war should come, a great, brave people would again send their sons to the front, and the National Guard and the volunteers would fight our battles. Every battle for liberty and humanity since Christian civilization was born in the womb of the dead centuries has been fought by volunteers.

The founders of this Republic were men of peace. They had no use for the pomp and pageantry of war. The mother of George Washington refused to let her boy join the British navy and wear the splendid uniform of an officer, but sent him off to survey the wilderness as a civil engineer.

"When This Cruel War is Over" was sung at every fireside from '62 to '65, and was caught up and reechoed back from every camp and bivouac. American ideals were the ideals of peace; Abraham Lincoln, and not Napoleon Bonaparte, was the idol of every true soldier's heart.

Here is a petition that should command the serious attention of every Member on this floor:

To the Representatives and Senators in Congress:

> We, the undersigned members of faculties in universities and colleges, and educators, earnestly protest against the extravagant demand for an addition of over $40,000,000 in the form of four new battle ships, cruisers, etc., inasmuch as no danger threatens the country not known last April, when President Roosevelt told the world: "We are no longer enlarging our Navy. We are simply keeping up its strength." Sixty-five per cent of the national income is now expended on war. The increase of our naval budget has recently been used in the French assembly as a reason for increasing its own; is largely responsible for the increase of armaments among Asiatic nations, and is well-nigh certain to retard that reduction in the armaments of the world for which we have so long been waiting.
> The growing discontent throughout the world at the appalling increase of waste of national resources must be heeded. We feel that this protest is the more necessary inasmuch as there are various new and effective methods now available for promoting international friendship and rationally settling difficulties which these new demands seem to ignore.

This petition is signed by 286 high-class scholars, university presidents, and humanitarians. Among the number I note: John H. Finley, president of the College of the City of New York; Clarence D. Ashley, dean of the law school, New York University; Henry W. Leipziger, supervisor of public lectures; John Bates Clark, Columbia University; George W. Kirchwey, dean of the law school, Columbia University; Charles P. Fagnani, Union Theological Seminary; Joseph French Johnson, New York University; M. B. Coles, Normal College; Cecile Freese, Horace Mann Schools; Edmund Burke, College of the City of New York; F. M. McMurry, teachers' college, Columbia University; William E. B. Starkweather, College of the City of New York; H. C. Bumpus, American Museum Natural History; Frederick Dielman, College of the City of New York.

The greatest statesman of the humanities of all civilizations is that world-famous Virginian, Thomas Jefferson. We need his prescient spirit now to save the Republic of Washington and Jackson and Lincoln from Hamiltonism, as now exploited with every waning moon in sky-rocket rhetoric and sentences loaded with dynamite and disaster.

In 1801 Thomas Jefferson wrote:

> Hamilton is ardent for the introduction of monarchy; eager for armies, making more noise for a great naval establishment than better patriots who wish it on a financial scale only commensurate to our wants and our means. This class ought to be tolerated, but not trusted.

Here is a fateful admonition for this very hour. And I call up Jefferson again, because his voice in the last year of the eighteenth century should be the voice of this Republic to-day.

In 1799 Jefferson wrote to Eldridge Gerry these words of supreme wisdom that every patriotic American should pause and ponder well. I quote:

> I am for relying for internal defense on our militia solely till actual invasion, and for such a naval force only as will protect our coast harbors from depredations, and not for a standing army in time of peace which may overcome the public sentiment; nor a navy which by its own expenses and the external wars in which it may implicate us will grind us with public burdens and sink us under them.

Let us not fail to note that all the great students and scholars and humanitarians on both sides of the Atlantic are to-day for peace and arbitration. The ethical movement of the age is against standing armies and big navies. No man of heart or capable thought believes that a big army and navy are messengers of peace. Even an ordinary dog fancier knows better. He knows that peace among the canine tribe would never be promoted if every man should breed and train a fighting bulldog. And the dogs of war, whether canine or human, are just the same. [Applause and laughter.]

The commerce of peace has wings of white, and her mission is the uplifting and betterment of man. She would never crimson the ocean with blood and our fair land with ghastly skeletons. We need no big standing army in times of peace. Cut down the army to the peace basis before the Spanish-American war. Give the $20,000,000 thus saved to the veterans that made the Union of these States permanent forty-three years ago.

The people whom I represent, living along the southern shores of Lake Erie (Toledo), want peace, and repose, and a fair chance in life's industrial battles. We are opposed to wasting the energies of business and commerce in idle armies that consume our substance and produce nothing. We know the better way and we like it.

England and the United States for the past eighty-five years have shown the better way, on 3,000 miles of Canadian border, by an exchange of notes by which the "fleet," the "navy" of both countries, on all the Great Lakes is limited to six vessels, none to be over one hundred tons burden; and the land border does not have a "fort" or Chinese wall to "protect" its citizens. By this effective, inexpensive, humane agreement vast sums that might have been spent on armies and navies are used to promote the benign pursuits of peace.

No black-nosed cannon, on either shore, point threatening messengers of death at the great steel freighters that plow these placid waters, and no armored ships of war with idle guns and idle men will ever be needed to protect the freighted transports of peace, amity, and prosperity. What we ask, what we have a right to demand, is that a part of the millions now wasted on armored ships of war and idle armies be devoted to the improvement of our rivers and harbors, to give impetus and opportunity to the advancing empire of a wholesome and beneficent industrial life.

Who says we can not afford to do justice to the veterans because reckless extravagance and criminal waste have caused a disastrous money panic, resulting in failing revenues? Cut down the enormous expenses and the way is easy. In 1890 the total appropriations for the support of the Government totaled $385,522,367. In 1907 the total expenditures amounted to the enormous sum of $944,848,268. This includes the big deficit of $24,051,257 reported to the present Congress. Here is the startling increase of $459,325,901 over the appropriations for 1890 for a single year. These figures indicate a criminal waste of the people's energies, of not less than $300,000,000 for one year alone. And the indifference of the masses of our people to this unparalleled extravagance is one of the most discouraging features in the decadence of patriotic devotion to public duty.

And now we are told by the party and the officials who are solely responsible for this $300,000,000 criminal waste that we can not afford $17,500,000 for the sad-faced old veterans of the civil war.

The safety of the Republic is in patriotic hearts and homes, and not in professional soldiers trained to kill for hire. A citizen soldiery established the Republic and a citizen soldiery preserved it from dissolution.

The hour is due to strike the death knell of militarism and imperialism—twin devils of rapacity and greed. The hour has come to call back the Republic of our fathers to its own. The hour is at hand to cast off the greed of empire and return once more to the plain simplicity of Jeffersonian Democracy. It was in the first year of the nineteenth century that the author of the Declaration of Independence rode up to our National Capitol on horseback to kill the deadening power of Federalism and start the new Republic on its true career. Let us hope and pray that in this epoch-making year a second Jefferson will arise, inspired with the same irrepressible genius of Democracy, and redeem this nation from imperialism and militarism and vampirism now sucking drop by drop the life blood of a great, brave, patient people.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, the discussions in this House of late have taken somewhat a varied range. However, in the main they have been directed to conditions rather than to principle and theory. There is a distinction between the Republican doctrine and the Democratic doctrine which reflects upon this very question. It is an underlying principle of Republicanism, if I understand it, that by legislation you can create a condition, that by the exercise of the law-making power you can create value and wealth and make a nation rich and prosperous by enacting laws, as against the Democratic doctrine which believes that the real function of government only is to insure to every man an even chance in the world, that believes in no protection except that protection which guarantees an open field and a fair fight to everyone, and the opportunity for every American citizen to work out his own salvation and accomplish his own destiny. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But the party that believes that by the exercise of the law-making power you can create conditions, that you can set aside the laws of nature and act in the face of Providence itself—on that party I say to-day rests the responsibility of accounting for conditions that exist at the present time. We have had much discussion heretofore by Republicans in regard to conditions. They have dwelt upon conditions that have existed for the last ten years or more. The excellent speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], to which we have just listened, recalls to our minds a speech by that same distinguished gentleman two years ago, when he dwelt upon conditions then existing, when, in his own language, he caught his lesson from the open furnaces in the land. To-day he is not looking into those open furnaces for instruction upon economic questions, but he has gone back one hundred years ago and seems to be getting his lessons from the theories and principles taught by Alexander Hamilton. It is not the discussion of present conditions that enlists his attention so much as the discussion of principles, and I commend the course to the gentleman and to that party. I believe that more good would be accomplished, that sounder philosophy would be reached, if they would discuss principles more and stand by natural and just principles more than they do by circumstances and conditions that are produced by causes beyond human control.

But, Mr. Chairman, I was very much impressed with the utterances of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania in regard to tariff revision in the speech just delivered to-day. He says he is not yet persuaded or convinced that it is right to revise the tariff even now, but, in recognition of the sentiment that he has located somewhere, that he has found to exist somewhere in the minds of American people, he believes it would be right to recognize the claims of those who think there should be revision, and indicates that his party, if there is no change of this sentiment, may promise to consider it. That, if it means anything, means that his party will yield to that doctrine that has ever controlled that party, that of expediency, rather than to stand by an honest conviction of what is right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, since the statement made by him that he may favor some sort of tariff revision, since there has been heard the voice that comes up from all over the land in favor of tariff revision, since we have the promise from the stand-patters themselves that some time in the distant future they will revise the tariff, it is not necessary to dwell upon the question or to discuss the reason of the Democratic faith on this question. What is needed is exhortation to act, to do the things that they confess themselves ought to be done, and to perform the duties that they say should be performed.

I shall not dwell upon this question, but simply allude to the fact that the conditions of to-day resulting from a half century of protection has convinced this country that there ought to be a revision. As I said, it is not argument that is needed, but exhortation, and I want to say right here it is a hopeless task to induce a protectionist to go forward in the support of that doctrine that gives an open field and fair fight to all people alike. When they are told what they ought to do and what is right they remind us very much of the young man in the Scriptures who sought instruction in righteousness and when he received that instruction "he went away sorrowful." We have conditions built up under this system that threaten the very stability of our Government, that defy regulation, and so far have staggered the enforcement of the law. The party of protectionism, the party of Republicanism, has been diligent in seeking to divert the public mind from the fact that these great institutions are a result of a protective system fostered and maintained by them.

They are ingenious in argument to show that the trusts are not the result of the tariff. One argument that has been so familiar to us all for the past several years is their reference to the Standard Oil trust. They have talked loud and long, saying that it was not affected by the tariff, but we have had some late discussion on this floor that reveals the fact that that trust has received more support, more help from protection perhaps than any other trust that exists in this land. I allude to the speech made by the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] and I want to reiterate and reproduce some of the points of that speech coming from a Republican source. I want to call attention to the evolution that is going on in the mind of that distinguished gentleman. He voices his faith in the protective system. He even goes so far as to say that the Dingley tariff bill is a perfect piece of legislation. It would seem there was no hope for a man of that kind. It would seem he was in outer darkness, but being an earnest and sincere man he has received some light and he acknowledges it, and says now that—many of the schedules ought to be revised and some tariff rates ought to be wiped out altogether.

He says—

when the steel trust of our country, with an actual capital of $360,000,000 and capitalized at $1,600,000,000, earns a profit of $180,000,000 in a single year, the time has arrived when that industry can stand on its own feet; no more protection is needed to help it along.

Then follows loud applause on the Democratic side. Now this is a conclusion the force of which is so irresistible that a Republican can see it, and further on he says that "the oil trust's profits have been so enormous they can hardly be expressed in figures taught in our common schools." Then he proceeds to call attention to a proviso hid away in the provisions of the Dingley bill that affords a rate of protection to the manufacturers of petroleum and its product greater than is enjoyed by many of the protected interests of this land. I have been much impressed with the evolution that is going on in the minds of Republicans, especially in the State of Wisconsin, whence comes my good friend. Several distinguished Republican members of this Congress from Wisconsin have given utterance to sound doctrine along different lines that shows their sympathy in the struggle between the special interests and the mass of the people to be on the side of the people. One of the evidences of dawning light upon the Republican mind is that to-day they are willing to confess that the panic that began a few months back is not due to Republican rule. They can account for it from natural causes. They recognize the existence of the laws of nature and the laws of cause and effect, and, I say, can satisfy themselves perfectly that no Republican legislation is at all responsible for that panic. They are fertile in resource and they can show this with great ingenuity, but this puts upon them a Herculean task, because it so happens that most of the panics that have occurred in this country have occurred during a time when the Republican party was in power. In support of this I desire to insert here an extract from the Commoner that contains some historic data that is very instructive to the country and I hope will be profitable to the grand old party.

[Extract from The Commoner.]

The truth is that every panic since the civil war originated under Republican rule and developed under Republican legislation.

The great panic which gave "Black Friday" to history occurred during the month of September, 1869, when the Republican party was in power.

The great panic marked by the failure of Jay Cooke & Co. occurred in September, 1873. Then the Republican party was in power and eleven months prior to the beginning of that panic that party had been re-elected to power.

The "panic of 1893" began long prior to that year and, indeed, long prior to the Presidential election of 1892; and it is a fact, although Republican orators and Republican organs try to forget it, that the so-called panic of 1893 began and played its greatest havoc under that famous tariff law known as the McKinley bill.

It may be well for Commoner readers to keep readily at hand some of the facts and figures relating to this question.

The Republican party was restored to power March 4, 1889.

The McKinley tariff bill became a law October 6, 1890, and remained in effect until August 27, 1894.

The Wilson tariff law, enacted by a Democratic Congress, went into effect August 27, 1894.

If anyone will take the trouble to examine the Republican campaign text-book for 1904, pages 125, 126, and 127, he will find considerable space devoted to a statement of business disasters from July 18, 1893, until November 13, 1894. The Republican managers expected their readers to remember that the Cleveland Administration was inaugurated March 4, 1893, and that all these disasters occurred under Democratic administration; but they expected their readers to forget that the Republican tariff law was in force up to August 27, 1894, or covering more than twelve months of the sixteen months' period of business disasters as described by the Republican text-book.

In their references to the panic of 1893 Republican orators and organs habitually overlook the date when the McKinley law ceased and the Wilson law went into effect. But when in their tariff discussions they are required to face the fact that that panic played its greatest havoc during the life of the Republican tariff law they answer that it was the anticipation of tariff legislation growing out of Democratic victory in 1892 which brought on these business disasters. For this reason in their list of business disasters they place July 18, 1893, as marking the beginning of that great panic.

Let it be remembered that the McKinley tariff bill became a law October 6, 1890, and that the first indications of the so-called panic of 1893–94 were given November 11, 1890, a litle more than thirty days after the McKinley tariff bill became a law. From that date the panic raged.

The Harrison Administration was inaugurated March 4, 1889, and when the first indications of this panic were given President Harrison had not exhausted the half of the term for which he was elected. It is admitted by every one familiar with the facts that President Harrison's Administration had plates prepared for the bonds, and Mr. Harrison's Secretary of the Treasury made a visit to New York for the purpose of negotiating the bond deal. He was wired by Mr. Harrison to return to Washington. Mr. Harrison said that he had concluded not to have any bond issues under his Administration, and in order to avoid the stigma the Harrison Administration warded off the bond issue and unloaded it on the incoming Cleveland Administration.

It may not be out of place to point out that when the Democratic Administration surrendered the reins of government March 4, 1889, there was in the Federal Treasury the largest surplus in history. When the Republican party went out of power March 4, 1893, there was a large deficit, and the incoming Administration was finally persuaded to make the bond issues which its Republican predecessor had at one time thought to be necessary, but had skillfully avoided.

The claim that the business disasters of the period referred to were due to the popular fear of tariff legislation to be enacted by Democrats is, as has been said, met by the fact that this panic began two years prior to the Presidential election day of 1892. The following will serve as reminders on this point:

November 11, 1890, the reports showed financial distress in New York. The New York Clearing-House Association voted its certificates to banks in need of assistance.

The Boston Clearing-House Association did the same thing November 17. Barker Bros. & Co., big bankers in Philadelphia, suspended at that time, with liabilities placed at $5,000,000.

November 19, 1890, there was a run on the Citizens' Savings Bank of New York, and a receiver was appointed for the North River Bank.

November 22, 1890, the United Rolling Stock Company of Chicago assigned, with liabilities at $6,851,000.

November 28, 1890, B. K. Jamieson & Co., the Philadelphia bankers, failed, with liabilities at $2,000,000.

December 6, 1890, the Oliver iron and steel mills of Pittsburg shut down, discharging 2,000 employees. On the same date the cotton firm of Myer & Co., of New Orleans, failed, with liabilities at $2,000,000.

January 3, 1891, the Scottdale rolling mills and pike works and the Charlotte furnace and coke works in Pennsylvania closed, throwing 10,000 employees out of work.

January 18, 1891, the American National Bank at Kansas City suspended, with liabilities at $2,250,000.

May 8, 1891, the Spring Garden National Bank at Philadelphia closed its doors, and the Pennsylvania Safe Deposit and Trust Company made an assignment.

The Homestead strike and other strikes during 1892, and prior to election day, are well remembered by the people.

The record discloses that the first indications of the so-called panic of 1893 were given November 11, 1890, a little more than thirty days after the McKinley tariff bill became a law. From that date the panic raged, and while its effects were felt for several years it reached its worst stage in 1893 and during the early days of 1894, during all of which time the Republican tariff law was in effect.

The late Thomas B. Reed, after his retirement from the Speakership, delivered a speech in New York in which he said: "Another thing which led this whole country into the error of 1892 was the history of the last thirty years. During all that time we have been prosperous." The New York World called this "cold, colossal, and impudent falsification of history," and said that it must have astonished those among his hearers whose memories were more than one year long. Then this New York paper gave Mr. Reed these interesting reminders:

"The panic of 1873, under Republican rule and twelve years of high tariff taxation, was the most disastrous and the period of business depresion for five years thereafter was the most severe of any in history. It was officially estimated that 3,000,000 workingmen were out of employment. Bankruptcy was widespread. A tidal wave of ruin and distress swept over the country.

"From 1881 to 1886, under two Republican tariffs, there were labor strikes involving 22,304 establishments and 1,323,203 workmen. Of these strikes 9,439 were for an increase of wages and 4,344 against reductions of wages.

"Mr. Reed's party tinkered the tariff in 1883. In that year there were 9,184 business failures, involving $172,874,000. In 1884 there were 10,968 failures, involving $226,343,000. In the next year, still under the Republican tariff and currency laws, there was a general business depression. More than 1,000,000 men were out of employment.

"In 1890 the McKinley bill was passed, and there were 10,673 failures in that year, and 12,394 the next, with liabilities in each year amounting to nearly $200,000,000. The tariff was raised to nearly 50 per cent, but wages either stood still or declined, while the prices of necessaries advanced. The protected manufacturers kept all their 'bonus' as usual.

"Tramps and trusts, the twin products of a monopolists' tariff, were practically unknown in this country until we had endured uninterrupted Republican rule for a dozen years.

"The worst labor troubles, the bloodiest riots, the most destructive strikes, the most brutal lockouts ever known in any country have occurred here under the high tariffs, bought, made, and paid for by the contributors of the Republican campaign funds."

We have enjoyed, Mr. Chairman, a prosperity for the few years that has misled many who, realizing the prosperity, have overlooked the real cause of that prosperity.

They have been listening to the Republican voice perpetually claiming credit for all the blessings of nature, and especially for this prosperity, until they have been misled, and it requires a rude shock to awaken them. We have had that shock lately. The American people, while we have had this prosperity, have not had a fair showing with it. While the industrious laboring man has been able to earn his bread and feed his family, yet those in the protected class have had the lion's share. They have grown rich to an extent which staggers the mind to contemplate. In this connection it is natural for our minds to revert to the speeches made by distinguished Republicans during the Fifty-ninth Congress. We all remember how the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] rung the changes upon existing conditions at that time, how he dwelt upon the word "prosperity," how he reiterated with so much unction the phrase "All kinds of work for all kinds of men." I want to put in comparison with that speech some of the utterances lately made by distinguished Republicans. Mr. Shaw, late a member of the President's Cabinet, said that "thousands of cars and railroad engines are standing idle, and that thousands of employees are out of work;" that "one-fourth of the population in several of the large cities are idle;" that "free soup houses exist in every industrial center," and that "farm products have decreased in value."

General Black, who was high authority among Republicans about the time of their nominating convention four years ago, says:

There are furnaces with their fires out and idle railroad trains with workmen sleeping in the cars.

And he alludes to the fact that "the cry of the striker is abroad in the land."

From the newspapers we see accounts of bands of unemployed labor organizing, and we learn that Coxey's army is again about to be on the march. A few days ago the police of Philadelphia fired into a so-called mob to quiet them, composed of the unemployed of that city. The Chaplain of this House recognizes the condition and prays for help and employment for the vast army of unemployed in this land. Was the prosperity that has so quickly changed to these conditions a healthy prosperity? It was extolled in high degree by the brilliant speeches that we listened to in the last Congress. I say brilliant, for they were brilliant in that they put the color of the rose upon many things that wear a different aspect now. Speeches were made that spread an artificial glow upon the protective system, that to the superficial listener made it appear attractive; but, Mr. Chairman—

> Not florid prose nor honeyed lines of rhyme
> Can blazon evil deeds or consecrate a crime.

A man whose power of speech can hide the deformity and conceal the unjust tariff system of to-day will be a conjurer of the language, indeed. So the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and others, charming as was their style of oratory, gifted in speech as they were, could not cover up the deformity or long conceal the wrongs of the American protective system.

The votaries of this system are ever on the watch to use every argument to delude the taxpayers of the nation into a support or toleration of their methods of taxation. Some of them are now even seeking to make use of the very conditions that are the result of the system, to show that it is unwise and dangerous to pursue honest methods to correct existing evils. They even attribute the late panic to the fact that there has been a disposition in some quarters to enforce the law and punish crime. These are some of the so-called conservatives. They arrogate to themselves the thought that they comprise the safe and sane class. These are they who complain about disturbing business conditions and disapprove with so much dignity all kinds of radicalism. Some of these are insisting on holding onto the present conditions, because they are beneficiaries of the system that has worked so much injury. We hear so much said about radicals and conservatives lately. These would make it appear a contest between a party of radicals and a party of conservatives, judging from the talk we hear.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Where does he put the stand-patter in his category in this particular connection he is now outlining? Are they conservatives or radicals?

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would say that the doctrine of the stand-patter to-day is to do nothing. The doctrine of the conservative is to go slow and say "Let us not be rash." The stand-patters are the men that have inspired the utterance that there is danger of radicalism in this country. They have inspired the doctrine and have taught this faith, that we must be conservative, we must be careful, or else we will ruin the business interests of the country. They have built up the protective system. They are the strength of the protective system, and their hope is in the Republican party, and they are the ones, I say, that are preaching the gospel of conservatism, because they want to fatten upon the spoils of that system. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. GOULDEN. I understand the gentleman, then, to say briefly that they are neither fish, flesh, nor fowl?

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, sir, it is right hard to tell what they are. They teach conservatism, but, as a matter of fact, they are the most radical men we have in all this country. I call a man who can favor the protective system of to-day and stand by it a radical, if I know what radicalism means. [Applause.]

It is noticeable that those who use these terms so much denominate themselves conservatives. This is a case that truly illustrates "the wolf in sheep's clothing." They favor a protective system that levies tribute upon the many for the benefit of the few, and to perpetuate that system they preach conservatism, which is but a pretext to delay and to prevent a reduction of the tariff or the correction of other evils upon which they thrive. They realize the complaint coming up from every quarter of this land asking for a reduction of the tariff duties and the righting of other great wrongs. They can not meet this demand by argument or reason to show it is not just. In fact, they confess a need for revision, but in order to delay revision they become eloquent in their plea for conservative action in this line, for the pretended fear that radical action would "distract business interests."

The man or the party that advocates the golden rule—that it is right to "do unto others as you would be done by"—is to them a "radical." A man that favors the enactment of law to regulate and control public carriers by just rules is an extremist and threatens to destroy the commerce of the country. [Applause.] The man that would prosecute a corporation and men for crimes worse than robbery is a dangerous man to be clothed with official power; and a President that gives countenance and support to the investigation and correction of wrongs and violations of law, if the wrongdoer is a corporation or has money enough to affect Wall street, then such a President is a menace to the country. To these men an earnest patriot is an old fogy; an officer that will discharge his duty without fear or favor is a dangerous member of the public service; an allusion to the Declaration of Independence indicates an agitator; the advocate of equal and exact justice is a disturber of the peace; and a reformer is an anarchist. Really, these representatives of special interests are unhappy, not from fear of the bogies they raise up to frighten and mislead the unwary, but for fear that the people are awake to their misdoings and their reign of extortion is coming to an end. [Applause.] One thing that adds to their grief is the fact that they are the very men that furnished the corruption fund and the boodle that paid the expenses of the campaign in which the President was elected. They nurtured and sustained him; they placed him where he is, and now—

> Keen are their pangs, but keener far to feel
> They nursed the pinion that impelled the steel.

[Applause.]

The worst radicalism that this country has known is that pursued by the high protectionists and by the trusts that have grown up under this class legislation. When a Republican tariff commission of 1882–83 recommended a reduction of tariff duties of 25 per cent and no reduction was made, but a higher rate followed, that resulted in 1897 in the Dingley bill; this was radicalism in the extreme; and when combinations are formed that are able to set aside the laws of supply and demand and fix their own price for an article or product, this is radicalism run riot. Mr. Chairman, those who represent a class, whether it be capital or labor, may be dangerous in their radicalism, but those who advocate the interests of the whole people and are seeking to right wrongs affecting the whole country are not the radicals that we have cause to fear.

The public is aroused. Republicans and Democrats alike are seeking to cleanse the conditions, and this has resulted in prosecuting some of the criminals who have committed the gravest crimes. But the cry is heard, "let us be conservative and go slow." [Applause.] These would stop the enforcement of the law upon the plea that it would disturb business conditions if you prosecute crime and enforce the law. This system of reasoning is consistent with that system that favors the method of creating wealth by levying tribute and the theory of making the country rich by the exercise of the taxing power. The crimes committed by those upheld by the fostering care of the Government have shocked the sense of the nation. They have caused inquiry, they have created a demand that methods be changed, crimes punished, and the law enforced. In response to this demand the President has taken action to enforce the law and to punish the malefactors in some instances. And to the extent that he has done this he has done well, and he has responded to the call of the conscience of the nation in so doing. He has accepted doctrines and taken precepts from Democratic authority, and should be commended by all men of all parties to the extent that he has put these principles into execution. [Applause.]

He is to be condemned because he has failed to do all that should have been done in this direction. It is a strange spectacle for a great political party to be so entwined with depredators that a proposition to punish crime and enforce the law against these evil doers should bring consternation and dismay to the leaders of that party, but such seems to be the state of affairs. When the President began to prosecute criminals, to correct wrongs that have grown up under the legislation of the Republican party and the fostering influence of protection, it caused such a shock that it convulsed the Republican party, if not the nation. All honor to the President for the lessons he has learned and for the courage he has shown in some instances in putting them into execution. There are some distinguished Republicans standing by him. But those others who have made tardy motion to follow after the President will, I fear, need the prayers of all the saints to give them the grace and the courage to follow in his lead.

"The trembling soul that halts and faints," etc. [Applause.] They are trying to assume an air of righteousness; they are whistling to keep their courage up. They have all of a sudden grown to approve the policies outlined in the President's late message. They stand upon the floor of the House and say, "We endorse them," yet I call attention to the fact that the President's first message lay upon the table for two long months without any fervid encomiums from Republican orators. They were as silent as the tomb of the Capulets. But when the second came, it got too hot for them; the light seemed to break in upon their benighted vision. It was a most remarkable spectacle presented in this House when this message was read, and I wish the American people could have seen that spectacle just as it occurred. When the clerk read the sound utterances of that paper, they met a responsive chord in the hearts of the Democrats on this floor. They began to applaud it, but several rounds of applause had been given by them before the Republicans could adjust themselves to the embarrassing situation of approving sound doctrine. As its reading progressed their embarrassment increased because its notes grew clearer. The usually beaming and florid face of their distinguished leader was "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought." They looked like orphans out in the cold, but with what grace they could muster they began to fall in after the lead of the doughty champion from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. They began with faint approval until finally they brought themselves to loud applause which was re-enforced by the same champion in his speech a day or two later in which he bore testimony by word of mouth that the Republicans were behind the President and would stand by his message. I am afraid you will stand a long ways behind him. [Applause.]

But that party is shifty, if not graceful; they can trim their sails to meet an adverse wind. But they have got an elephant on their hands. Oh, if they could only turn him loose! They are like the boy yoked with the calf—they want somebody to "head us."

Democracy has furnished the sound doctrines, and if the President has profited thereby it is well for the country, and we do not abandon them because he has subscribed to them now. President Lincoln once said:

> I must stand with anybody that stands right; stand with him while he is right and part with him when he goes wrong.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we naturally feel a great pride in the party of Jefferson and Jackson, and we would love to see honor to whom honor is due, but far above this sentiment is our desire to see our country's best interests subserved, and we welcome the champion of these principles, although he comes from the ranks of that party that has eschewed these doctrines in the past. In all frankness, we give approval and applause to those utterances of the President that in such vigorous terms advocate the cause of the people against these combinations that have sprung up under the fostering care of Republicanism. We will stand by our colors and welcome the volunteer service that comes from any and every quarter for the doctrines that we believe are just and for principles that we believe are everlasting. But this same ingenuity that has so subtly promoted the interests of the classes is active now in originating devices and doctrines to perpetuate their power and continue their reign of depredation. They use the words "safe and sane," "conservatism," and "due regard for business interests" with so much dignity and earnestness that one unacquainted with the facts and the knowledge of the source from whence these expressions come would think that the wise, patriotic, and sober-minded part of our people were about to be the victims of an upheaval caused by cranks and fanatics; but when we realize, as every thoughtful man must, that much of this cry of danger comes from those who are fattening upon the abuse of governmental powers, and that they are now attempting to disarm the honest reformer by this cry of radicalism, then we know that the chief danger lies not in the so-called radicals, but in the miscalled conservatives. [Applause.]

When, twelve years ago, W. J. Bryan began to call attention to the wrongs and dangers of the great monopolies and combinations then looming up in this country, he was denounced as a socialist and an anarchist, but he has been steadfast in his arraignment of these wrongs, until to-day he is indorsed and supported by the American people; Democrats and Republicans alike approve his advocacy of honest methods and fair dealing. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] Many who are now appropriating some of these doctrines as their own were a few short years ago denouncing them as demagogy and socialism. Notwithstanding this, we must still remember that "The vilest sinner may return," and we welcome them with that charity that will cover a multitude of sins, if they will but repent and turn from the error of their way. [Applause.]

But it is said by some of these conservatives, whom the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has so properly denominated "assistant Republicans," that Democrats are too loud in their applause of the President. They are pathetic in their solicitude for fear Mr. Bryan has been too outspoken in his commendation of the President's late message; they are afraid these words of approval will come back to discomfort and annoy us in the coming campaign. Some of these are the same that have time and again been so uneasy for fear Mr. Bryan had expressed his views to such an extent that it would injure him, so afraid that he had been indiscreet. They have been so deeply concerned, so solicitous about his welfare; they have made known to all the world their grave apprehension and deep regret. I trust such things will deceive the American people no longer.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say here and to emphasize the statement that I do not include in this class all of those who are advocating conservatism at the present time, for in this class are many earnest and patriotic Democrats who sincerely fear extreme action may be taken. They have heard the murmur of complaint and they are afraid the remedies will be too drastic. I think these fears are groundless. To my mind there is much more danger of hesitation and failure to fully correct these evils. And I desire to say further that I do not favor such action as would fail to fully recognize the rights of all men, rich or poor, of corporations or of individuals, nor does the Democratic party favor any such doctrine [applause]; but I am for that radicalism, if you call it such, that will take positive action and will not compromise or temporize with extortion or crime. [Renewed applause.]

I have no fear of that radicalism that demands in behalf of the people simple justice and no more; I very much distrust a conservatism that would be content with less.

Mr. Bryan was right when he commended certain parts of the President's message. Much of it was sound; some of it was utterly wrong. When the Republican party, being in power and able to act, was standing still and doing nothing under the conditions that exist to-day, there was need for a message, a call to action, to duty. They have had that call and they feel the force of it and of the circumstances that made it necessary. It is a rebuke that in their inmost hearts they feel, no matter how serene they may appear nor with what sang-froid they may seek to hide their chagrin. They now say that the Republican party is behind the President and that message. They were mighty slow to fall into ranks, and they do not impress one now with the appearance of a charging column, rushing shoulder to shoulder in support of their leader. We do not see evidences of that "swelling of the heart," etc.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, that the conviction of the President to sound doctrine was more thorough. He has shown some noble impulses, but he has been unable to shake off that "body of death" of Republicanism. It would seem that a spirit like his would scorn the system that gathers spoils from the foul foray of protectionism, especially in view of his past utterances on that subject. [Applause.]

He seems—

> ——— A warrior tried.
> He can boldly speak and fairly ride.

But the President of a great nation that can support or tolerate the system of taxation that produces and promotes the very evils that he so loudly condemns, and advise a postponement of their correction, is still, notwithstanding his bold and fervent speech, politically in the "gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity." [Applause.]

I would speak in no disrespect of the President, but would show the deference and regard due to him and to his exalted position. There are many things about him to admire.

> I grant him brave,
> But wild as Bracklin's thundering wave.

Many noble impulses seem to spring from his strong mind, but sometimes it is as the garden of the sluggard in which the vile and filthy weeds spring up to choke out the fair and wholesome blossom. [Applause.]

> Wildly while his virtues gleam,
> They make his errors darker seem,
> And flash along his spirit high
> Like lightning o'er the midnight sky.

He is a striking example of the imperfections of human nature. He is a mixture of strength and weakness. He illustrates that mankind is "unco' weak and little to be trusted." Paul Morton was too close to him for the balance to be "rightly adjusted." And many other wrongdoers have not received at his hands the punishment they deserved. His administration is a mixture of good and bad policies.

"I wish the good were not so few, I wish the bad were fewer." The Democrats are ready to cooperate with the President and to enact legislation to carry out many of the suggestions made in his message. We challenge you on the other side to make good your assertion that you will support the President in his message. The leader of the Democrats has pointed out with clearness the issues recommended by him that we will stand by you in enacting into law. We are ready to join hands. How can you, if you are sincere, refuse to come to the mark and here now, before this Congress adjourns, pass the laws that you say you favor and that the country so much needs. The country will want an answer to this question.

There are many evidences of improvement. The skies look brighter and the way seems clear. A few days ago Senator BEVERIDGE, in speaking of present conditions, said:

This period will be called in history the renaissance of American conscience. The tricks of politics no longer deceive the people. It will not do in these days to talk about any human brotherhood; it will not do to denounce our political opponents. You can not take the people's mind in that way from the burning questions of the day. The old and disgraceful political devices can no longer win elections. A ticket nominated by money or intrigue now means certain defeat at the polls.

Let us hope that this is true; and it augurs well for the truth of the statement that it comes from a prominent man in that party that has thrived by the use of the very means he so lustily condemns.

It seems from the signs of the times that this year Democracy is to be at the full tide and that success awaits us in November. The party has had of late many "counsels sweet" and many "lengthened sage advices" as to whom we should nominate for President, but that question is already answered, the choice is already made. The great Democratic heart of this country throbs with but one emotion on this point. Instinctively and naturally it turns to that man who has fought its battles for the last dozen years and who has never swerved from the helm when the tide swelled high; who in the unequal contest against the Republican party, entrenched in position, power, and wealth, and crippled and wounded by members of his own party, has still in defeat never faltered, but steadfastly stood for the rights of his fellow-men. Those who have fattened upon the power and advantage given by unjust laws have used every argument that ingenuity could devise or cunning invent to compass his defeat then as they are doing now. When they can find no reason why, by reason of his character, his fidelity, and his ability, he should not be chosen as nominee, then they resort to the sordid argument that he can not win. Thus they would tempt us to sacrifice the cause of right and justice for a base barter for votes—to sell the birthright of Democracy for the spoils of office, for a place at the pie counter. Mr. Chairman, it is pleasing to win laurels, to gain victories; it is good to succeed; but it is better to stand for the right, to be faithful and true. Again Abraham Lincoln said:

I am not bound to win, but I am bound to be true; I am not bound to succeed, but I am bound to live up to the light I have.

This argument of anything to win is offered by those of this commercial age who would tempt us to surrender all for place and power. They tell us that he is battered over with defeat and is unfit for leader. When did it come to pass that the scars of noble battle are a badge of discredit? When the time shall come that the fact of a lost campaign is a reason to mark a man or a cause as unworthy, then shall Democracy be compelled to lower its colors; then, and not till then, will she "Close her bright eye and curb her high career" because of the defeats she has sustained in the past. But, sir, I stand for a different doctrine. I believe that no question is ever settled until it is settled right. That—

Truth crushed to earth shall rise again.

That—

Freedom's battle once begun,
Though baffled oft, is ever won.

And while our leader is not infallible and has uttered views on some subjects that we may not agree with, yet to-day he is in harmony with his party on every material issue. His candor in expressing his views on public questions commends him to the confidence of those who may not agree with him on all subjects. It is a testimonial to his courage and honesty that he does not refuse to express his honest convictions on questions affecting the welfare of the country. Absolutely candid has he been with the American people. He has bared himself to public scrutiny and discussed more freely public questions than any American statesman of the present or past. He has not spared himself from critical dissection, and after all this crucial experience he is less vulnerable and has committed fewer mistakes than most public men, and to-day he stands out simple, great, and good, the favorite of his party, respected and beloved by his fellow-men and the ideal American citizen of to-day. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I was very much amused just now when the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was making his campaign speech to notice that he claimed everything for the Republican party with the exception of the panic, and he let that go begging for a "daddy." This panic was born in your own household. [Applause on Democratic side.] You should not be ashamed of your own child. [Applause.] It is yours—it favors you—and it is the general opinion of the whole country that, though it is ugly, it is yours, and that you should not be robbed of the credit of its fatherhood. [Applause.] You should not be so unfatherly as to try to disclaim this "lone child" of your household. [Applause.] We of this side are inclined to agree with you that if this "child" which you are trying to disclaim is not an orphan now it soon will be, for the death knell of your party has already been sounded. [Applause, minority.]

Some men who have occupied positions in this body have been criticised for neglect of duty. I am one of the few, if indeed there are others, who have been criticised by a few narrow-minded men who are my political foes for manifesting too much zeal and displaying too much activity in the interest of my district and constituents. This charge is not one of the things that I "view with alarm." It is one to which I "point with pride." [Applause.] Bills can not become laws unless they are introduced.

When my people selected me to represent them here I felt that they had honored me greatly. The position itself I did not value so highly as the expression of confidence that my election implied. There are a quarter of a million people in my district and quite a number of able men. It is the empire district of the Empire State of the South. I did not flatter myself with the idea that I had been chosen because of superior ability. I took my election to indicate a feeling of confidence among my people that I would be true to their interests at all times and under all circumstances; and that I would work tirelessly to accomplish good results for them. This I have done, and this I propose to do to the end. [Applause.]

I am not one of those who think that membership in this House is a privilege to be complacently enjoyed. I think it involves duties that must not be shirked; work that must not be evaded; obligations that must be met. I am one of those who believe that the characterization of a public official as a public servant is not the insincere utterances of a demagogue endeavoring to delude the people, but is a sober statement of fact. If I do the best I can to serve my people and fail, it will be my misfortune, not my fault. If I do not try, I will add to popular condemnation, which is bad, the condemnation of my own conscience, which is worse. I believe in effort, and will continue my efforts as long as I am here. [Applause.]

So much by way of personal explanation. I rise to discuss a bill introduced in the interest of the people of my district and the millions who live in other districts in the South, for the establishment of a subtreasury in a section where subtreasuries can not be found. [Applause.]

The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7563) to locate a subtreasury at Savannah, Ga.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be appointed immediately an assistant treasurer of the United States, to be located in the city of Savannah, in the State of Georgia; and such assistant treasurer shall be appointed in like manner, for like time, and be subject to all the provisions of law to which the other assistant treasurers of the United States are subject.

SEC. 2. That there shall be prepared within the United States custom-house located in said city suitable and convenient rooms for the use of the assistant treasurer herein authorized, and sufficient and secure fire-proof vaults and safes for the keeping of the public moneys collected and deposited with him; and the said assistant treasurer shall have the custody and care of said rooms, vaults, and safes as may be temporarily assigned to him, and he shall perform all the duties required to be performed by other United States assistant treasurers in reference to the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of such moneys.

SEC. 3. That the assistant treasurer authorized by this act to be appointed shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum, to be paid quarter yearly at the Treasury of the United States, which shall be in full for his services.

SEC. 4. That there shall be employed in the office of said assistant treasurer one cashier and one chief clerk, at a compensation of $2,000 per annum each; one clerk, at $1,800 per annum; one clerk, at $1,600 per annum; one messenger and one watchman, at $720 per annum each, which officers shall be appointed in the same manner as is now provided by law for the office of other subtreasurers, and their salaries shall be payable in regular monthly installments at the Treasury of the United States and shall be in full for their services.

SEC. 5. That there shall be appropriated and paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury in such repairs and alterations as may be necessary to put in good condition for immediate use such offices, rooms, vaults, and safes herein mentioned as may be required, and in the purchase of any additional furniture and fixtures, and in defraying any other incidental expenses necessary to carry this act into effect.

I wish to add that this bill was introduced by me upon the combined requests of the officers of the municipality and the trade bodies of the city of Savannah, Ga.

A passenger may take a train at Boston, where a subtreasury is located, and in six hours can reach the subtreasury in New York. In a little over two hours more he can see the subtreasury at Philadelphia and in another two hours or a little over another at Baltimore, and another hour's ride will bring him in sight of the massive Treasury building here.

Then, if he is going southward, he has seen the last of Uncle Sam's strong boxes for many hours and many miles. He has passed them an average of three hours apart north of the Potomac. He will then take a faster train than the one he has been riding on and not see another until more than a day has elapsed, and, after seeing this one, will reach the shores of the Pacific before he sees another.

Why is this difference? Is the country he is passing through uninhabited? It has about one-third of the population of the entire United States. It has a larger population than any nation in Europe except six, and it is growing so rapidly that it wil pass two of these six in a quarter of a century. Is it unprogressive? If so, Americans must import all their energy from abroad, for it is the purest-blooded American of any section of the Union. It is not unprogressive. It is growing more rapidly in wealth and in all those lines of development that wealth opens and grows from than any other part of this broad land. [Applause.]

Why is it that subtreasuries are so much needed at the North and not needed at the South? I confess that I do not understand, but it looks as if what was good for one section was considered not good for another; or else the interests of one have been attended to at the expense of the other. [Applause.]

The States that border on the Atlantic north of Washington, including Pennsylvania, have a population of 22,419,474 and have four subtreasuries—one for each 5,604,869 people.

The States bordering on the Atlantic south of Washington and on the Gulf, including also West Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona, having a population of 23,190,271, have only one subtreasury.

The balance of the Union, having a population of 30,260,923, has four subtreasuries—one for each 7,565,231 people.

Divided in area the first-named group of States, with 183,675 square miles, have four subtreasuries. This is equal to a territory 428 miles square, or four blocks 214 miles square each. A subtreasury in the center of each of these blocks would leave no part of this territory more than 151 miles distant from it. As this section has four subtreasuries it would have one for each of four blocks.

The second group is over six times as extensive as the first, having 1,120,400 square miles—an area equal to a block 1,058 miles square. A subtreasury in the middle of such block would be 748 miles distant from its most remote part.

The balance of the country has an area of 1,724,644 square miles, which would be equal to 1,312 miles square. As this has four subtreasuries, it could be divided into four blocks of 656 miles square each, with each having a subtreasury. A subtreasury in the center of each of these blocks would be not more than 464 miles from the most distant part.

The South, which produces 80 per cent of the world's cotton, is not fairly represented in the location of subtreasuries even in proportion to its wealth, accepting the census of 1900 as a basis of comparison, and this basis would not be fair to this section, for the South has made greater gains than any other part of the country during the last seven years. Judged even by the census of 1900, the North Atlantic States, with Delaware and Maryland added, had four subtreasuries and a combined wealth of $33,835,566,694—a subtreasury for $8,458,891,673. The States composing the Southern and South Central divisions, with New Mexico and Arizona substituted for Delaware, Maryland, and the District of Columbia, had only one subtreasury, though their combined wealth reached a total of $12,958,843,128; while the balance of the country, with a combined wealth of $40,794,159,180, had four subtreasuries—one for each $10,198,539,795.

The South furnished more than one-third of the exports of the country last year, and between one-fourth and one-fifth of the whole of the country's trade flowed through southern ports, but it had only one subtreasury out of nine. It is unjust to that great section of the country, and to the South's patriotic citizens. We should be given more recognition. [Applause.]

But the bill that I am discussing relates to a particular part of the South which has fared worse than the section taken as a whole, for it has no subtreasury at all. This section includes ten States, with a population of 16,339,740. Of these States Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Mississippi, and West Tennessee would not be benefited by this bill, because they are convenient to Baltimore, Washington, Cincinnati, New Orleans, or St. Louis. But the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Alabama, with middle and East Tennessee, remain as a group that should have this convenience.

These States at the present time have a population of more than 10,000,000; they cover an area of more than 280,000 square miles; their combined wealth amounts to more than $4,000,000,000, and one-twelfth of the total of exports from the entire country goes through their ports. [Applause.]

Except in these States there is no nook or corner of the United States east of the Mississippi River that is not within ten hours' ride of a subtreasury. Many parts of these States are more than twenty-four hours distant. This is not on account of a lack of railroads. They are well supplied. It is not because their railroads make poor time. They average with the railroads of other sections in this respect. It is solely because a wide stretch of country has been neglected, and grossly neglected without reason and without excuse. [Applause.]

A subtreasury located in this section, where it would be most accessible to all parts, would not be as near as Washington or Baltimore to Virginia; as near as Baltimore, Washington, or Cincinnati to West Virginia; as near as Cincinnati to Kentucky; as near as Cincinnati, St. Louis, or New Orleans to West Tennessee, or as near as New Orleans to Mississippi. So these States and their cities may be eliminated from consideration, and, in Alabama, Mobile would be eliminated by its proximity to New Orleans.

I believe Savannah should be selected as the location for the subtreasury to serve this section because it is a seaport, because it does a larger business than any other city in that section, and because it is more centrally located for this territory than any other seaport or than nearly any of the other larger cities. The Government has a magnificent custom-house at Savannah, and the cost to fit up quarters for it would be only nominal, which fact should strongly appeal to you.

All the subtreasuries except three are located at seaports, because at the ports is handled not only all the local business, but the business of interior cities as well. In value of exports Savannah is the seventh port of the United States, being surpassed only by New York, Galveston, New Orleans, Baltimore, Boston, and Philadelphia. At all these ports except Galveston subtreasuries are already located, and one is located at San Francisco, which does a much smaller exporting business than Savannah.

In the above statement only the foreign business is counted. Half as much more is shipped through the port of Savannah to the large seaports of the North, to be shipped through them abroad. If this were credited to Savannah she would be a larger exporting port than Philadelphia, and in some years larger than Boston. [Applause.]

These statements refer to the present time. Savannah's exports increased from $20,913,335 in 1885 to $63,039,824 in 1907—a gain of over 200 per cent in twenty-two years. None of the Atlantic ports which now surpass Savannah in exports are gaining half so rapidly. If the gains of the past continue into the future, Savannah in fifteen years will be second only to New York among the Atlantic ports in the value of her exports. I wish to emphasize the additional fact that Savannah has never had a bank failure. [Applause.] She has weathered many panics, too.

The following table shows the value of exports, and of exports and imports combined, through ports south of the Potomac and east of the Mississippi, for the year ending with June 30, 1907:

	Exports.	Exports and imports.
Savannah	$63,039,824	$65,243,691

Savannah	63,039,824	65,243,691

The amount deducted from the total is that of the exports and combined exports and imports of the cities of Virginia, that would be in closer touch with Washington; and, Mobile and Pearl River, that would be in closer touch with New Orleans than with any city in this section, in which a subtreasury might be located. Taking these out, we find the foreign trade of Savannah nearly as large as that of all the others combined and nearly twice as large as that of all the other Atlantic ports in this section combined.

If the subtreasury should be located on the seacoast, Savannah would have no competitor. The next most important ports, valued by foreign business handled, are Pensacola and Wilmington. Neither has a foreign trade one-third as large as that of Savannah. Neither has much more than one-third as many people or one-third as much business.

The only seaport in this section that is nearly as large as Savannah is Charleston, but Savannah handles over fourteen times as much foreign business as Charleston, and her bank clearings are over three times as large as the clearings of Charleston.

But whether we consider seaports or interior towns, Savannah is, in business, the first city of this section. [Applause.] The following figures show the average of the annual bank clearings of the leading cities of that section during the last three years:

Savannah	$233, 289, 066
Atlanta	225, 529, 782
Nashville	189, 088, 197
Birmingham	98, 811, 886
Augusta	91, 212, 123
Knoxville	70, 737, 960
Charleston	68, 299, 289
Jacksonville	67, 533, 360
Chattanooga	64, 332, 973

So much for Savannah's present stand. What about her future place among the cities of the South? We can only judge by the past. I have already shown you that Savannah's foreign trade gained over 200 per cent in twenty-two years. Her cotton trade has more than doubled in number of bales in ten years, and has more than doubled in value in seven years. Her shipments of lumber have more than doubled in eight years. It is the first naval-stores port of the world and a close second in cotton and lumber. Her banking capital has increased 50 per cent in six years. Her bank deposits have increased more than 50 per cent in six years, and the banks have doubled their loans and discounts in seven years. The tonnage of vessels entering or leaving the port has increased 800 per cent in twenty-five years. [Applause.]

Savannah had two and a half times as many manufacturing industries in 1905 as in 1900, and the capital invested in them increased 113 per cent. The value of her buildings erected in 1905 was nearly 50 per cent greater than in 1900. Her postoffice receipts increased more than 50 per cent during this time. The four systems of railroads that send a large part of their business through her port reach into ten States and have a trackage of 15,630 miles. It is no dead city that I am asking you to locate a subtreasury in, but one of the most prosperous and most progressive cities in the whole country. [Applause.]

And it is a city that has furnished more money than any east of the Mississippi River, perhaps more than all southern towns east of the Mississippi River combined, to help the farmers grow and market their crops. On this subject I can not do better than quote from a booklet prepared recently by the mayor of the city, the presidents of the chamber of commerce, the board of trade, the cotton exchange, and the clearing-house association. These gentlemen say:

During the spring and summer months large sums of money are advanced to the farmers direct or through interior banks, to plant and raise the crops, and later to move them.

The million and a half bales received by Savannah come principally from Georgia, Alabama, South Carolina, Florida, Mississippi, and Tennessee. The interior banks in these States are the intermediaries between the planter and the shipper at interior points and the Savannah banks. For instance, the interior merchants either send their cotton to a Savannah factor for sale, or sell it to the Savannah exporters, or sell it abroad themselves. In each case Savannah has to furnish the money. If it is sent to Savannah for sale, it is drawn against; if sold to a Savannah exporter, it is drawn against. But if sold abroad, which constitutes a large part of the business, the foreign exchange is generally sold to some banker in New York. Against this sale of exchange the interior shipper gives the interior bank his foreign draft, with a railroad bill of lading for the cotton attached, and gets from his bank the value of the foreign exchange. These documents are sent to the Savannah banks to have the railroad's bill of lading exchanged for a port bill of lading. Now, a steamer is not over ten days loading, and to fill their freight engagements the interior merchants send their documents forward in order to give the actual cotton time to get to port for the steamer. This frequently has to be done before the steamer has arrived. The banks in Savannah then have to hold these documents until the steamer has arrived, in order to get a port bill of lading. In the meantime the Savannah bank has to send cash by express to the interior bank. Now, on arrival of the steamer port ladings have been received; these documents are all sent to New York, with requests that money be expressed on receipt of the documents. This takes from five to six days. With a subtreasury in Savannah the New York bank could deposit with the subtreasury in New York the amount of the draft, with instructions, by wire, to pay the Savannah bank the same day, and thus save from two to three days.

The Government gets a lower rate of expressage than the banks, and this would be another benefit.

During the busy season the banks are sometimes compelled, owing to the volume of business and delayed steamers, to advise their interior correspondents to hold up their documents. From two to three days' saving would, therefore, mean a great deal to this portion of the country.

We wish to emphasize just here that this is not a local situation applicable to Savannah alone, but the relief given by the establishment of a subtreasury at Savannah would assist the whole adjacent country.

The same conditions could not exist at an interior city, for the documents referred to can never go there for final adjustment.

We need a subtreasury in Savannah, and we need it badly. I hope you will give it to us.

I have presented the claims of Savannah for a subtreasury as well as I have been able. In doing this necessarily I talked about the city itself, but I am not acting solely in the interest of its people. The people on the farms and the wage-earners, all of whose interest I will help to guard and further while I am here, would derive as much benefit as those in the city from the establishment of a subtreasury there. It would put more money in that section of the country and there would be less danger of panics in that section in the future.

The man behind the plow has made Savannah, and, in turn, has been benefited by the energy of the people who have gathered there to help in the exchange of farm products for the products the farmer needs. A lawyer is earning his fees throughout the year, and in spring, summer, autumn, and winter seeds of disease are producing a harvest that keeps the doctor busy and keeps a stream of dollars coming in to support him. The merchant sells his goods every day and the manufacturer's product is daily placed on the market. Every one but the farmer has a comparatively steady income flowing in throughout the year, but the farmer has no money except during the last three months of the year, unless he has saved from some previous year. Others may keep out of debt by having a week's income ahead, for by the time that is spent more will be in hand; but the farmer must have enough on hand in December to last him until September, or he will have to go in debt.

Many of the farmers of my district can look the world in the face without fear or anxiety. Their barns are full and they have deposits in the banks, and they have their cotton stored away, holding it for higher prices. But there are many others who have to go in debt to a greater or less extent every year. These directly or indirectly get their advances from Savannah to a greater extent than from any other city, and feel it keenly when Savannah has not plenty of money. Here again the necessity of the subtreasury is seen. They would be benefited by anything that would keep the money of Savannah from being tied up, as much of it often is, in paying for products and receiving pay in return only after the delay of the mails. This trouble would be greatly reduced by the establishment of a subtreasury in Savannah, and the farmers would be benefited fully as much, if not more, than the people of Savannah.

Even those farmers who owe nothing and have money in banks would be benefited, for the interests of mankind are so interlinked that all must share somewhat in the misfortune of others. The farmers who must sell their cotton as soon as it is picked and ginned depress the price offered to their more fortunate neighbors who are out of debt. So in introducing and advocating this bill I am acting in the interest of all and to the hurt of none. [Applause.]

I do not want you to get the impression that we have not felt the panic in Georgia. We have felt it, and felt it severely, too. Ordinarily the South is independent, and is becoming more and more so each year as her great possibilities are being developed, yet the panic that is now upon us has seriously interfered with all business interests in that section.

Manufacturers, bankers, farmers, merchants, laborers, in fact, every class, have felt the effect of this panic. In many instances there have been failures. I know of many sad cases of this kind in my district, and the thought of the hard times that my people and friends are seeing is painful to me. I have felt it keenly myself and am feeling it with my people.

What now most seriously concerns me is the fact that a great many of the large corporations and industries of the South are taking action to cut the wages of the laboring men and the wage-earners. Of course conditions are bad, but I can not see how these large institutions can expect the laboring men and wage-earners to live on less than they are now getting, with prices of provisions and living expenses so high. These institutions should forego dividends rather than take the necessaries out of the homes of our worthy wage-earners.

The country generally understands that this is a Republican Administration and a Republican panic. You Republicans are strongly in the majority in this Congress and you are absolutely controlling all legislation, and if relief is not given to the people it can not be charged up to the Democratic party, because we are in the minority and you who are in control of this House and in control of this Congress, with a large Republican majority, will neither give relief to the people nor let us give relief. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe that the Government has the right to issue money and that in such a crisis as this it should issue paper money in sufficient amount to relieve the panic-stricken country, to reestablish confidence, and to put business back upon a normal basis. It has been the policy of this country for many years to permit the stock gamblers and money sharks of Wall street to control absolutely the financial policy of the country. It is high time that the people were waking up to this awful situation and demanding that such legislation be passed that will divorce our financial system from New York. It is a known fact that Wall street controls and dictates the policy of our financial system and controls the money of the Government. It is aimed by his bill, which shows the earmarks of "the sys-

It is deplorable that the Government will permit such a state of affairs as exists under our present system, which has proven a failure on more occasions than the present. It is so adjusted, unfortunately, that one man in Wall street can press a button and almost instantly throw the whole country into a financial panic. The unscrupulous money sharks of Wall street, taking advantage of the assistance of the present Administration, undoubtedly created this panic with a view to squeezing the people. [Applause.] Through the great loss that the people will sustain throughout the whole country these criminal panic producers will reap millions of ill-gotten money. [Applause.]

The plan that is proposed by Senator ALDRICH is, in my opinion, a most objectionable one and will continue to give this same den of thieves on Wall street the same opportunity to pilfer the pockets of the people, and we will have no relief. [Applause.] tem" on its face, to more than ever make New York the money center of the country. [Applause.] That will operate to the hurt of the banks elsewhere, and especially the country banks of the South. [Applause.]

The Government should exercise its right to issue money and do it in sufficient volume to adequately respond to our ever-increasing needs. The country is badly in need of another Jackson as President. I have introduced a resolution in Congress urging that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed and required to at once issue paper money to the amount of $103,318,984, and to immediately put it into circulation in the United States, to temporarily relieve the panic. There is no doubt in my mind but that the Secretary has the right, as the law now stands, even without this resolution, to issue this amount of money, and he ought to be compelled to do his duty. The laws authorizing this issue have been on the statute books for many, many years, and this amount remains unissued under that authority. If my resolution is passed, and if the Secretary of the Treasury would issue this money, it would be a great relief to the people who are suffering from the effects of this panic from one end of the country to the other. [Applause.]

People in every quarter of the country are demanding relief, and this Congress would do well, instead of passing bills providing for enormous expenditures for larger navies and larger armies, to turn its attention to the financial question and give some relief. It is a matter upon which party issues should be thrown aside and Representatives in Congress should be actuated by a patriotic sense of duty to the country and should take up this matter and see that some relief is given as quickly as possible.

With these few remarks on the financial question I am going to leave it until a later date, when I hope again to get the floor and address the House on this important question.

While I have the floor I wish to express my hearty indorsement of the bills introduced by Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota and Mr. WILEY of Alabama, providing for Federal aid, through State control, to agricultural and industrial schools. I shall have something to say about these bills later.

Legislation has heretofore operated, as a rule, to benefit other classes and add to the burdens borne by the farmers and wage-earners. We have taxed the farmers and laborers to raise money to divide among the manufacturers. I said "we," but I did not mean it. I have not done this, nor have my friends on the Democratic side of the Chamber. I said "we," but I meant you Republicans have done it. [Applause.]

Legislation has built up the cities at the expense of the country, and it is high time we were endeavoring to do something for the country. [Applause.] The proper education of our young men and women, fitting them for the duties of life, is the salvation of our nation. [Applause.]

I have introduced a bill to provide for the acquisition of ground to increase the efficiency of the marine hospital at Savannah; and another to provide for the deepening of the harbor and improving the navigation of the Savannah River from its mouth to Augusta. Much that I have just said of Savannah as a shipping center, and as a great, progressive city, applies with as much force to the advocacy of these bills as to the one I have been supporting to-day. Another bill that I have introduced—for drainage and reclamation, or rather for a preliminary investigation looking to drainage and reclamation of the swamp and wet lands in my district—will, if it results in such action as I ask, improve the health of that country and add to the productive area of the First Georgia District nearly a million acres of the most fertile lands in the United States. There is as much reason for the drainage of low lands as there is for the irrigation of the arid lands. These are among the efforts that I am making to look after the interests I was sent here to look after. If I succeed, I will be glad. If I fail, I will not reproach myself for not trying to do my duty by those who have intrusted me with the responsibilities of this high office. [Applause.] I went to work the first day I arrived and will work faithfully in the interest of my district and the people I represent until Congress adjourns. My own conscience as to what my duties are is what I go by, and not by the whims and demagogic criticism of my political enemies. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HAY. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FORNES].

Mr. FORNES. Mr. Chairman, I have heard it stated many times that prosperity has returned. I received to-day an article published in a Republican paper, in a Republican city, that I have not time to read, but I will ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There are those who claim that prosperity has returned and that its return is due to the efforts of the Republican party. I have here a definition from its own source, from a paper that claims it has the largest circulation in that city, and if they peruse it, I think, perhaps, they may change their views. I trust, as a New York merchant, that they will. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORNES. The article is from the Philadelphia Inquirer, and I ask that it be inserted at this place.

The article is as follows:

[The Philadelphia Inquirer, Tuesday, February 25, 1908.]

A FEW WORDS WITH CONGRESS—LOOSEN UP THE TREASURY PURSE—PUT THE UNEMPLOYED AT WORK.

We would like to have a few words with Congress this morning.

That means, of course, the Republican majority, for the Republicans are largely in control of both House and Senate. They are, therefore, responsible to the country.

The Inquirer is a sturdy Republican journal, always the advocate of Republican principles and doctrine. It not only enjoys a greater circulation than any other newspaper in Pennsylvania, but there is no Republican journal throughout the United States that begins to compare with it in respect to the multitude of readers reached every day in the year. We may be pardoned, under such circumstances, if we feel that we have a right to speak in behalf of the Republican masses.

A period has been reached in this country where industrial depression has become a most serious matter. The army of the unemployed in every city in the land has been swelled to enormous proportions.

These men who want work and can not get it do not care for theories.

They want bread.

They look to municipal authorities for aid, but most of all to the Congress of the United States.

Now, it so happens that this is the Presidential year. That is unfortunate, for always in a Presidential year certain Republican leaders in Washington become impressed with a species of terror that a part of the Democratic campaign may consist of the cry of "extravagance." As a consequence they are seized with a spasm of economy. They insist that not a dollar that can be held back in any possible way shall be expended. They sharpen the pruning knife and slash ruthlessly. They argue among themselves that this is good politics.

We must beg to differ with them. It is not good politics. It is the very reverse.

For be it understood that these tens and scores of thousands of the unemployed are not bothering themselves about theories.

They are facing actual conditions.

They know that the United States Treasury is stuffed with surplus millions of dollars.

They can not understand why, in times of such pressing need, the padlock should be double locked.

The nation is itself prosperous. It is only they themselves who do not share in the prosperity of the Government. They may be told that current expenses may exceed the current receipts of the next few months. That makes no impression, for they know that such a deficit can be but temporary, and meanwhile they have been taught to believe that a surplus is intended for use in times of depression, in precisely such times as are now upon us.

Here is the question which the gentlemen who make laws in Washington must answer:

What effect will the tightening of the purse strings, to meet a fancied political emergency, have upon the citizens of the United States, and especially citizens in those sections where there is a congestion of unemployed labor?

Will it make votes for the Republican party at the coming election to throw out every possible appropriation for public works that can be postponed?

Can the Republican orators go upon the political stump and argue as their best card that the Republican Congress is meeting the conditions that obtain in the country by halting every progressive step and thus actually swelling the ranks of the idle?

We greatly fear that such an argument will produce anything but favorable results. It is not miserly, cheeseparing economy on the part of a great and wealthy nation, with millions of dollars lying dormant in the Treasury, that will appeal to the multitudes. What these multitudes wish to hear and will expect to hear is that the Government has loosened up on the purse strings and that by plunging into public works in a systematic manner will be able to find employment for many thousands of the unemployed who are now crying for bread.

The cry of "Extravagance!" Who is going to listen to the cry of "extravagance?"

Certainly not the wage-earners.

What do they care about any such theory as that when the Treasury is bursting with useless money? "Give us work!" That is going to be their response to the political speakers, and there is no getting away from it.

It is conceded very generally in these days, after years of academic discussion, that there is no greater public enterprise before the country than the development of the waterways.

Senator KNOX recently delivered an address in Pittsburg on this subject, which is far above anything yet said in this line. His argument was perfect. He showed conclusively and convincingly that if the Government would go to work at once to develop these highways of commerce the investment, no matter how large it might be, would bring forth vast profits. Freight rates would be lowered. New manufacturing plants would spring up where the hum of the wheels of industry is now unheard. He did not believe in a policy which dug out a harbor or a river channel one year and then practically abandoned the work until another opportunity should arise. It was his argument that a system of development as wide and as universal as the demands of commerce require should be entered upon as the most pressing and most important enterprise in which the Government could embark. He would not go at it by piecemeal. He would develop on a grand scale, because the sooner the vast work is accomplished the sooner will the country and the people reap the benefits.

That scholarly and thoughtful address was such a magnificent presentation of burning facts, so fully met the requirements of the nation, that it was ordered printed by a vote of the Senate, although the speech had been delivered in a far-away city. Such action was almost, if not quite, unprecedented.

Now, if it is conceded—and by this vote of approval the Senate did so concede—that Congress must provide for the development of the waterways of the nation, why not enter upon the work at once—not by appropriating a million dollars next year and two millions the year after, and taking the vast improvement up in a haphazard way, but by going at it as a whole with the intention of finishing the entire system by the time the Panama Canal, with its 35-foot channel, is ready for business?

One bill before Congress sets aside $50,000,000 a year for the next ten years for this development. Senator KNOX proposes a bond issue that will provide sufficient funds for the immediate and continuous and speedy prosecution of the scheme for national expansion of commerce.

We believe in the KNOX argument.

And let us tell our Congressional friends that if they are looking for an argument in the Presidential election they can appeal to the multitudes in no better way than by adopting the policy of the immediate development of the waterways and by putting thousands of the unemployed at work.

Again, what is all this talk about building only two battle ships when the Navy Department asks for four? Isn't it good plain common sense to keep the shipyards at work? We have got to have those ships anyhow, and why not construct them in this time of depression? Suppose we do cut into the surplus a little, what of it? Again we ask, what is a surplus for?

It is a serious and indefensible blunder, and we can not repeat this too often, to tie up the purse strings. The nation is confronting splendid enterprises which make for progress and prosperity. We have talked about them long enough. Why not go at them at once—now—and put the unemployed laborers at work?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I had agreed to yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], but I do not see him here and have not seen him for some time. If he is not here, I have no further use for the time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has a little time, I should like just a moment for the purpose of requesting the insertion in the RECORD of some documents which I have here.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In connection with the question of the International Paper Company—the paper trust and wood-pulp trust—I desire to have inserted in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a report made by Mr. Herman Ridder, president of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, bearing upon that question and upon the course of conduct being now pursued by the paper trust in keeping up the price of print paper.

The report is as follows:

AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION,
New York, February 19, 1908.

DEAR SIR: At the suggestion of the subcommittee on paper of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association I submit the following for the information of publishers and for such comments as may seem proper to them.

Yours, faithfully, HERMAN RIDDER, President.

It is important that newspaper publishers who are paying excessive prices for news-print paper, should know that during the month of January the paper mills in this country in the aggregate have not been running more than 60 to 65 per cent of the usual time. The International Paper Company has shut down. Wilder Mill, Franklin Mill, and Umbagog, Piercefield, and Herkimer had been shut down in 1907. Dispatches from these places say similar orders have been sent to numerous other mills of the company in New England, and that the adoption of this general policy of curtailment is due to the fact that storehouses have been filled with the finished product, and that for a time the production has been greater than the needs of the trade. The fact is that newspaper publishers everywhere have been reducing the size of their issues and have been lopping off returns to prevent waste. In addition, the enforcement of the new postal regulations against illegitimate mail-order publications has materially reduced the consumption of news-print paper. Canadian mills are pushing their capacity to the utmost and are underselling American mills in the United States market, notwithstanding the duty of $6 per ton against the Canadian mills.

The Fiber and Manila Association in December, 1907, curtailed the output of manila paper to the extent of 15,000 tons in an effort to maintain the inflated prices of last year. Jobbers who had refused to replenish their stocks at the high prices were asked to place new orders upon a guaranty that the high prices would be maintained for sixty days. Other divisions of the American Paper and Pulp Association making other kinds of paper have been holding meetings and devising means to curtail production and to maintain the high prices obtained by combination. Nevertheless, the president of the American Paper and Pulp Association, Mr. David S. Cowles, in opening the annual meeting of that body on Thursday, February 6, 1908, said: "The present condition of business is one which requires very careful handling. It has been plunged from a great condition of prosperity to a condition of great depression." Trade authorities concede that the domestic pulp market is demoralized, and that the agreements of some of the groups necessary to maintain paper prices are things of the past.

The proceedings at the recent meetings of the various groups of paper makers have not been disclosed to the public, but the effort to maintain excessive news-print prices are continued in face of considerable declines in the prices of raw materials. The programme thus far indicated provides for running on part time and for adherence to combination prices, upon the calculation that the savings in the lower cost of raw materials will offset the losses due to running the mills on part time. Thousands of paper makers have been thrown out of employment while this scheme of embarrassed or sickly operation or complete suspension is carried out. Paper makers might revive their business by reducing prices. They might relieve the distress of their own laborers for whose benefit they obtained a tariff on paper. They have decided upon the policy of curtailment in production, high prices to customers, and idleness for their employees.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, in addition to that I should like to insert in the RECORD a reprint of an editorial lately written by Mr. Samuel Gompers, and published in the American Federationist of February, 1908, in relation to the injunction upheld by Judge Gould against the American Federation of Labor, because they had published the name of a firm under the heading, "We do not patronize."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The document is as follows:

FREE PRESS AND FREE SPEECH INVADED BY INJUNCTION AGAINST THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR—A REVIEW AND PROTEST.

[Editorial by Samuel Gompers, from American Federationist, February, 1908.]

Justice Gould, of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, issued an injunction on December 18, 1907, against the American Federation of Labor and its officers and all persons within the jurisdiction of the court.

This injunction enjoins them as officials or as individuals from any reference whatsoever to the Buck's Stove and Range Company's relations to organized labor, to the fact that the said company is regarded as unfair—that it is on an "unfair" list, or on the "We don't patronize" list of the American Federation of Labor. The injunction orders that the facts in controversy between the Buck's Stove and Range Company and organized labor must not be referred to, either by printed or written word or orally. The American Federation of Labor and its officers are each and severally named in the injunction. This injunction is the most sweeping ever issued.

It is an invasion of the liberty of the press and the right of free speech.

On account of its invasion of these two fundamental liberties this injunction should be seriously considered by every citizen of our country.

It is the American Federation of Labor and the American Federationist that are now enjoined. To-morrow it may be another publication or some other class of equally law-abiding citizens, and the present injunction may then be quoted as a sacred precedent for future encroachments upon the liberties of the people.

With all due respect to the court, it is impossible for us to see how we can comply with all the terms of this injunction. We would not be performing our duty to labor and to the public without discussion of this injunction. A great principle is at stake. Our forefathers sacrificed even life in order that these fundamental constitutional rights of free press and free speech might be forever guaranteed to our people. We would be recreant to our duty did we not do all in our power to point out to the people the serious invasion of their liberties which has taken place. That this has been done by judge-made injunction and not by statute law makes the menace all the greater.

There is no law in our country—and we feel safe in saying that no law could be passed by the consent of the people—which would deny to the humblest citizen the right of free expression through speech or by means of the press, and yet this is now attempted by injunction.

There is no disrespect to the judge or the court when we state with solemn conviction that we believe this injunction to be unwarranted.

Suppression of freedom of the press is a most serious thing, whether occurring in Russia or in the United States. It is because the present injunction commands this that we feel it our duty to enter an emphatic protest.

It has long been a recognized and an established principle that the publisher should be uncensored in what he publishes, although he may be held personally and criminally liable for what he utters. If what is published is wrong or false, it is within the power of the courts to punish by using the ordinary process of law, but not by a judge-made injunction.

The publication of the Buck's Stove and Range Company on the "We don't patronize" list of the American Federation of Labor is the exercise of a plain right. To enjoin its publication is to invade and deny the freedom of the press—a right which is guaranteed under our Constitution.

The right to print, which has grown up through the centuries of freedom, has its basis in the fundamental guaranties of human liberty. It has been defended and upheld by the ablest minds. It ought not to be forbidden by judicial order.

The matter of attempting to suppress the boycott of the Buck's Stove and Range Company by injunction, while important, yet pales into insignificance before this invasion and denial of constitutional rights.

We shall consider this question fully, and we urge the most serious and careful thought on the subject by our fellow-workers and fellow-citizens.

For years we have pointed out the fact—and we believe the greater part of the intelligent public are in entire accord with us—that the injunction process was originally intended to apply to property rights only, and never was intended to interfere with personal rights—personal liberty. In fact, it never is applied to the personal rights and liberties of citizens other than if these citizens are wage-workers.

We discuss this injunction and feel obliged, as a matter of conscience and principle, to protest against its issuance and its enforcement, yet we desire it to be clearly understood that the editor of the American Federationist does not consider himself thereby violating any law of either State or nation, nor does he intend or advise any disrespect toward the courts of our country. And yet inherent, natural, and constitutional rights and guaranties must be defended and maintained.

The men composing the organizations federated in the American Federation of Labor are as law-abiding, as honorable, and as upright as can be found in any walk of life.

We feel it our solemn duty to defend our unions and the men connected with our movement from any insinuation that they are lawless or that they are associated together for any unlawful purpose.

Though the wageworkers or their chosen representatives may be the pioneers in this protest, though they may be misunderstood, aye, even persecuted, for conscience sake, yet will their labors bear fruit, and coming generations of our people will thank those who, at this time, had the clarity of vision to see the right and the courage to strive manfully for the protection of our liberties against aggression.

This injunction against the American Federation of Labor contains many points with which we have hitherto been obliged to deal at long range.

We had hoped that the application for this injunction would be denied on the ground that there was no real basis of complaint in the plaintiff's allegations against the American Federation of Labor. The American Federation of Labor was represented by able attorneys and their arguments showed clearly that there was nothing unlawful in the fact that large numbers of wageworkers simultaneously declined to purchase the Buck's stoves and ranges.

The plaintiff for the Buck's Stove and Range Company, also its president, is no other than Mr. Van Cleave, also president of the National Association of Manufacturers. The recent contemptible attacks of the manufacturers' association's hirelings upon the character of the men of labor are still fresh in the public mind. The application for an injunction against the publication as "unfair" of the Buck's Stove and Range Company by the American Federation of Labor savored very much of an attempt to use the courts in the prosecution of the manufacturers' association's avowed union-crushing campaign.

We do not for an instant insinuate or affirm that Justice Gould knowingly lent himself to the machinations of the manufacturers' association, but we feel convinced that he was not at all familiar with the unscrupulous means which the manufacturers' association adopts in order to accomplish its purposes, or he might have hesitated to accept in good faith the allegations of the Buck's Stove and Range Company in regard to its treatment by the American Federation of Labor.

It is quite true that certain union employees to whom the Buck's Stove and Range Company declined to concede the prevailing hours of labor made this fact known to their fellow-workers through the columns of the American Federationist and through many other publications in various parts of the country, and the American Federation of Labor indorsed their position and published the same.

The entire procedure was truthful, fair, and honorable. We had a right to inform the public as to the facts in the case. Wageworkers and, indeed, many others prefer to give their patronage to firms which employ union labor and whose product, for that reason, is likely to be of a more satisfactory quality to the consumer.

If the champions of the nonunion shop are so proud of their stand in the matter and so convinced of their own fairness and wisdom we really fail to see why they should object to the publication of that fact.

If, as they claim, the public is with them and disapproves of unions and their method of "collective bargaining," we should think that the publication of the fact of a firm declining to pay union wages or concede union hours would be its best possible advertisement and one that would be eagerly sought. Not so, it seems. The Buck's Stove and Range Company, judging from the terms of the injunction, desires to stifle the voice of labor and enforce a continuous and unbroken silence on the subject of its bad standing with union workmen.

In the application for the injunction it was alleged by the Buck's Stove and Range Company that its business has suffered seriously from the refusal of union workmen and their friends to purchase its stoves and ranges. But would not absolute silence on our part as to its hostile attitude toward certain union employees be dishonest? Why should we encourage our members and friends to buy the Buck's stoves and ranges under the apprehension that this company deals fairly with union labor? Could not union employers then accuse us of unfair discrimination, of trickery and humbug?

If Mr. Van Cleave's opposition to the union shop is a matter of honest and conscientious conviction we should think he would writhe in pain under an injunction which prevents the publication of that fact.

The injunction is printed in full in this issue of the American Federationist. We hope our readers will study carefully every word and every phrase. It is a most remarkable injunction.

Justice Gould seems to base this injunction on the assumption that there has been a combination of numbers of wage-earners "conspiring" to commit unlawful acts. Such is not the fact. The public should understand clearly the difference between combinations for unlawful purposes and the voluntary associations of wage-earners for entirely lawful and proper purposes.

Let us for a moment consider what are some of the aims and purposes of our labor movement: To render means and opportunity of employment less precarious; to improve the standard of life; to uproot ignorance and foster education; to establish a normal workday; instill character, manhood, and an independent spirit among our people; to establish the recognition of the interdependence of man upon man, and that no man can be sufficient unto himself; that he must not shirk a duty to his fellows; to take children from the factory and the workshop, the mill, the mine, and to give them the opportunity of the school, the home, and the playground. In a word, to lighten toil, brighten man, to cheer the home and the fireside, to contribute our effort to make life the better worth living. To achieve these ends, all honorable and lawful means are not only justifiable, but commendable, and should receive the sympathetic support of every right-thinking American, rather than bitter, relentless antagonism.

But, to return to the consideration of the injunction, Justice Gould quotes Judge (now Secretary of War) Taft's definition of a boycott as follows:

"A boycott is a combination of many to cause a loss to one person by coercing others, against their will, to withdraw from him their beneficial business intercourse through threats that unless these others do so that many will cause serious loss to them."

Justice Gould adopted this definition in preference to that found in the Cyclopædia of Pleadings and Practice, and seemed to feel that Judge Taft furnished an illustrious precedent for the granting of this injunction.

True, Secretary Taft has an injunction history (see American Federationist editorial, October and November, 1907), but since he has become a candidate for President he does not seem proud of that record. He has recently tried to "explain" and not very successfully, because he, like many other injunction judges, did not think it necessary, before granting sweeping injunctions, to acquire a knowledge of modern economics and the proper application of judicial principles thereto. Is Judge Taft the highest authority on what constitutes a boycott or grounds for an injunction of this character?

The very injunction proceedings from which Justice Gould quoted Judge Taft, and other precedents he mentions, were cases in which the injunction privilege was abused by being wrongfully applied. Two wrongs do not make a right in an injunction any more than other affairs of life.

Secretary Taft says a boycott is a combination of many to cause a loss to one person by coercing others against their will to withdraw from him their beneficial business intercourse by threats.

We defy anyone to prove a single instance in this case where men or organizations combined to "coerce" others against their will to withdraw patronage from the Buck's Stove and Range Company. Neither coercion, threats, nor conspiracy in the unlawful sense have been resorted to, yet the whole injunction is based upon this wrong assumption.

Our unions and the men of labor are doing a public service in informing fellow-workers and friends of the fact that certain employers refuse to recognize the associated effort of the workers. This very class of employers organize themselves into combinations and vigorously use the secret blacklist to hound good citizens and union men from employment. They use every weapon, lawful and unlawful, to crush unions. No wonder they are ashamed to have their tactics made public.

The members of organized labor are not themselves obliged to refrain from dealing with the firms on the "We don't patronize" list of the American Federation of Labor. The information is given them. There is no compulsion. They are entirely free to use their own judgment.

It must be remembered, however, that for the one firm which declines to employ union labor there are probably a score in the same business which prefer it on account of its greater skill and reliability and for many other sound economic reasons. Such firms are conceded to turn out a higher quality of product than nonunion concerns. The members of organized labor naturally desire to expend their earnings to the best advantage when purchasing and wish to be informed as to what firms do and do not employ union labor. In purchasing it is often a question of the quality of the goods offered. The "boycott" is a letting alone of undesirable goods.

No person can be compelled to buy an article. If the purchaser chooses to let alone certain products for any reason or for no reason, there is no way of compelling him to buy.

This injunction can not compel union men or their friends to buy the Buck's stoves and ranges. For this reason the injunction will fail to bolster up the business of this firm, which it claims is so swiftly declining.

Individuals as members of organized labor will still exercise the right to buy or not to buy the Buck's stoves and ranges. It is an exemplification of the saying that "You can lead a horse to water, but you can't make him drink," and more than likely these men of organized labor and their friends will continue to exercise their right to purchase or not purchase the Buck's stoves and ranges.

It may not be amiss here to say that in all these proceedings, whether before the court or in the contest forced upon labor by the Buck's Stove and Range Company, no element of personal malice or ill will enters. Labor is earnestly desirous of entering into friendly relations with employers, and this is none the less true of its desire to reach an honorable adjustment and agreement with the Buck's Stove and Range Company. So long, however, as that company continues in its hostile attitude to labor, denying it the right to organize, discriminates against union members, and refuses to accord conditions of employment generally regarded as fair in the trade, it must expect retaliatory measures; these measures always, however, within the law and for the purpose of ultimately reaching an honorable, mutually advantageous agreement.

The publication of the Buck's Stove and Range Company on the "We don't patronize" list of the American Federation of Labor is only an incident in the history of the case. These stoves might have been let as severely alone by purchasers if they had never been mentioned on that list. It is not the matter of removing that firm from the list against which we primarily protest, it is this injunction invading the freedom of the press.

Justice Gould, in one portion of his opinion, says:

"Defendants [the American Federation of Labor] have the right either individually or collectively to sell their labor to whom they please, on such terms as they please, and to decline to buy plaintiff's stoves; they have also the right to decline to traffic with dealers who handle plaintiff's stoves."

Here he states precisely the whole case of the American Federation of Labor. This is what we have done. This is the sum total of labor's offending. The publication of the Buck's Stove and Range Company and other firms on the "We don't patronize" list is merely giving truthful information at the request of our members as to whether or not certain firms employ union men and concede the other conditions of employment usually granted by those concerns which recognize union labor.

It would seem that having made the above-quoted statement Justice Gould would have found in it the reason for a refusal to issue the injunction. He, however, goes on to assume that there has been some unwarrantable interference with the plaintiff's business, though neither in his opinion nor in the injunction itself does he make it clear how he arrived at the conclusion that the union course was any other than as indicated in his own language.

We wish to point out that there exists no law under which we could have been haled before any court for the exercise of free speech and freedom of the press in order to explain to our fellow-workers and friends the circumstances under which the Buck's Stove and Range Company manufactures its goods, and its attitude toward labor. Yet, under the terms of this injunction we are peremptorily cut off from the exercise of these rights.

We have had occasion in the past to call attention to the fact that the danger of the injunction, as used in labor cases and in no other, is that persons are often forbidden the doing of perfectly lawful things—are enjoined from the exercise of their rights as citizens, and then found in contempt and punished if they fail to submit to the course laid down in the injunction mandate.

It is puzzling to be charged with coercion, conspiracy, and what not, and enjoined from the exercise of free speech and free use of the press just as if we had been guilty of those things of which we are entirely innocent.

It is true that there do exist illegal combinations and conspiracies for the the purpose of unwarrantable interference with business, or even its destruction, but these are not organized by wage-workers. The criminal conspiracies in restraint of trade are organized by pirate trusts, by rascally promoters, by unscrupulous manipulators of finance.

The air is filled with the lamentations of the innocent victims of such conspiracies, but do we ever hear of these pirates in the business world being enjoined from continuing their depredations or threatened with contempt proceedings if they do not desist from their unlawful practices, which even involve property rights? Never! These injunctions are applied to wage-workers exclusively, though they involve personal rights and liberties. It is this denial of equality before the law against which we protest.

In making these statements we are not indulging in unjustifiable or disrespectful criticism of the judge who issued this injunction. We assume that he acted in accordance with the dictates of his conscience and his best judgment.

One point we have been making for years in regard to other injunctions is equally applicable to this case. We contend that the power to issue injunctions involving personal rights and liberties should not be left to the discretion of any judge, no matter how wise, how discreet, or how learned.

President Roosevelt in his recent message to Congress made the following comment on the abuse of the injunction power:

"Instances of abuses in the granting of injunctions in labor disputes continue to occur, and the resentment in the minds of those who feel that their rights are being invaded and their liberty of action and of speech unwarrantably restrained continues likewise to grow. Much of the attack on the use of the process of injunction is wholly without warrant; but I am constrained to express the belief that for some of it there is warrant. This question is becoming more and more one of prime importance, and unless the courts will themselves deal with it in effective manner, it is certain ultimately to demand some form of legislative action. It would be most unfortunate for our social welfare, if we should permit many honest and law-abiding citizens to feel that they had just cause for regarding our courts with hostility. I earnestly commend to the attention of the Congress this matter, so that some way may be devised which will limit the abuse of injunctions and protect those rights which from time to time it unwarrantably invades. Moreover, discontent is often expressed with the use of the process of injunction by the courts, not only in labor disputes, but where State laws are concerned."

We earnestly hope that public opinion on this subject will be so compelling, so widespread, and so intense that Congress will at an early date crystallize into statute law the expression of this feeling by enacting the American Federation of Labor bill "to limit and regulate injunctions" which is designed to restrain the improper use of the injunction power and to protect rights which have been unwarrantably invaded.

It is our earnest hope that our protest of to-day in behalf of justice and right may find expression in the laws of to-morrow.

We have already stated that the case of the Buck's Stove and Range Company against the American Federation of Labor and its officers is represented by able counsel. Additional counsel, foremost at the bar of our country, has been added. Regardless of any phase which the case may assume, it will be continued by the American Federation of Labor until a final decision has been rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States.

We repeat here what we have elsewhere said, that when the true historian shall present to the world the great struggles of the past and of the present; when the tinsel and false coloring shall have been removed from the real figures and events, there will be revealed to mankind's astonished gaze the continuous struggle of labor against tyranny, brutality, and injustice; the struggle for the right, for humanity, for progress, and for civilization. The trade unions and the federation of our time are in their very essence, the continuity of the historically developed progress of labor through the ages. We can not stop; we must go on.

In the official organ of the National Association of Manufacturers, one of the counsel for the Buck's Stove and Range Company declares that punishment for violation of the injunction issued by Justice Gould against the American Federation of Labor applies particularly to those within the territorial limits of the District of Columbia who violate the terms of the injunction; that those who violate the terms of the injunction in any other part of the country outside of the District of Columbia can be punished only when they thereafter come within the territorial limits of the District of Columbia. Counsel for the American Federation of Labor assure us that this construction of the court's order is accurate.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] had three minutes of time that I could have controlled, but he does not desire to use it. I wish to yield that three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL].

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I should like to invite the attention of this House and of the country to a noteworthy event that has just happened in the United States Treasury, an event so extraordinary that it will be chronicled and commented upon with surprise and amazement in every financial center in the world, and an event which all the citizens of our Republic, without regard to party affiliations, may well contemplate with satisfaction and pride.

Through the courtesy of Mr. Treat, the Treasurer of the United States, I have just received the announcement by telephone that for the first time the gold coin and bullion in the United States Treasury has reached and passed the sum of one thousand million dollars. [Applause.] This coin and bullion is divided into $150,000,000 in the reserve fund, $829,651,869 in the trust fund, and $20,821,162.45 in the general fund.

These figures are, of course, simply bewildering, and we can not grasp their full significance without apt and illuminating comparisons. It may be said, in the first place, that so far as we have any historical records, this is far and away the largest store of gold that was ever collected at any one time in any one place and under one control. [Applause.] It was only a short time ago, at the close of the Fifty-ninth Congress, that I called attention to the fact that the gold coin and bullion in the Treasury had then for the first time reached and passed the $900,000,000 mark; so that in less than two years this store of gold in the United States Treasury has increased $100,000,000. If we compare this with the store of gold at various other periods in the history of the country, we can realize the enormous strength of the Treasury of this nation at the present time. The total store of gold in the United States Treasury at the close of the fiscal year 1893 was, in round figures, $189,000,000; in 1894 the total was $131,000,000, and in 1895 the total was $156,000,000. To-day the sum is $1,000,473,031.45. Such a showing as this, with our 2 per cent bonds selling above par, shows that the condition of the United States to-day is financially impregnable. [Applause].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, before the general debate closes I should like about a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] not to claim any further time, but of course he can do so.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, this is in the nature of a personal privilege. The other day, in the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill, I said that the judges of the Arizona courts received certain compensation, as I had been informed, through the boards of supervisors of the different counties. When I made that statement I believed it, having been informed that that was the fact. I have a letter to-day from Chief Justice Kent, who corrects that statement, and I wish to correct the mistake that that may have created in the minds of gentlemen of the House.

The legislature of the Territory passed a law giving to these Federal judges the extra compensation, and not the counties in which they hold their courts. As some criticism was made of the judges receiving such funds, Judge Kent called my attention to the misstatement of facts that I had made and informed me of the real condition. I take occasion thus publicly to let the facts be known to the committee.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, supplementing and bearing upon the statement just made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], I desire to say that within the past few days I have been looking into the possibility of still further increasing that stock of gold, and I find that, beginning with the panic month of October, this country has sold over $792,000,000 worth of its products, the exports being increased enormously in the liquidation of the debts which existed at the time of the panic, and that during the last three months alone the balance of trade in favor of the United States has been $328,000,000, reaching the enormous sum of $120,000,000 in January.

When a distinguished English financier was in the House the other day I asked him this question: "You have sent us $106,000,000 of that balance; how are you going to pay the remainder?" He replied: "I think it will probably be met in the absorption of dividends on foreign investments in this country and the cancellation of maturing short-term railroad loans." We have only to liquidate and sell our products at a fair price at the rate we have been doing, and we will not only maintain the stock of gold we now have, but we will add largely to it from the reserves of Europe. We have the natural resources in this country, and it is only a question of whether we will sell at a fair price now; and in proof of that I want to call attention to a statement recently made by Sir Felix Schuster, of London, that prices and interest rates in Europe were dependent on the manner in which Congress shall legislate on the currency propositions now pending before it. He says: "If the effect of that legislation be to largely increase the currency on the basis of securities, either Government or otherwise, without any relation to gold, then we may again have an outburst of speculation which may not only prevent prices from falling, but may increase them, and thus bring about a worse condition of affairs than that which we have recently witnessed."

Is it not better by far to liquidate now and at fair prices, to turn the yellow tide again this way, to build up our reserves, and develop our industries? For the surplus products must be sold at some time and at a price in competition with the world. The gold of Europe is ours if we will take it.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is exhausted and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system: For defraying the cost of such extensions and betterments of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system as may be approved by the Secretary of War, to be available until expended from the receipts of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system that have been covered into the Treasury of the United States, the extent of such extensions and the cost thereof to be reported to Congress by the Secretary of War, $200,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph, and I would like to call the attention of the chairman to this fact: This is for the Alaska military cable and telegraph and provides that it shall be available until expended. The title of the bill is to make "appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year," and so forth. The Constitution of the United States provides that no appropriation for the support of the Army shall be made for a longer term than two years. While I have great respect for the Committee on Military Affairs, I doubt whether a bill reported from that committee can override the constitutional provision.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I very cordially indorse the well-grounded doubt expressed by the gentleman from Illinois, but I want to say that the Military Committee has no disposition whatever to override that provision of the Constitution; but, Mr. Chairman, the conditions in Alaska relating to this work are such that limiting it to the fiscal year would make it utterly useless.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to changing it so that it shall be available through the next fiscal year. This appropriation, I fear, would be unconstitutional and would not be available at all.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We have had it in here before, and it has not worked that way.

Mr. MANN. But the attention of the Comptroller has not been called to the language of the Constitution. The next Administration might read the Constitution. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman from Illinois need not be uneasy about a future change. In these conditions in Alaska they must have more than the fiscal year. This is the ordinary way in which the appropriation has been made. The season up there is only about four months in length. Now, this is in one sense military, although not really for the support of the Army.

Mr. MANN. It is under a bill which is entitled "for the support of the Army," and if it is not for the support of the Army then, of course, it has no place in the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It may be subject to a point of order, but I do not believe it is subject to the Constitutional objection the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes, because it is not for the support of the Army any more than the maintenance of a fort would be for the support of the Army or a barracks or anything of that kind—a permanent structure, for instance. It strikes me that there is serious doubt about this provision being in conflict with the Constitution, but is is doubtless subject to a point of order for one reason or another.

Mr. MANN. I thought perhaps the Committee on Military Affairs were the best judges of what their bill was for. They have entitled it "A bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909," even to the extent of omitting the ordinary formula, "and for other purposes."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman knows that the title of a bill has——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I understand.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Little or nothing to do with the interpretation of its provisions.

Mr. MANN. I know also that this committee has no jurisdiction to report anything in this bill that is not for the support of the Army.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to say that this telegraph was simply for connecting the different posts and in the interest of economy as well as in the interest of good administration. There are large distances between the posts there, with small detachments of troops in each. It is true this telegraph company, operated by the Signal Corps of the Army, does do business outside of the Army, and it is for the great benefit of the people who are settled in Alaska that they may be permitted to use it for that purpose. It is true that it operates at something of a profit over the cost of maintenance, but not cost of operation, and the amount received from the civilians who use it goes a long way toward paying the entire expense of its operation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is like a military road.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I understand so.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A military road may be constructed and maintained, and there might be no Army in the country at all; yet the Government would have authority, it seems to me, to establish and maintain military roads, and an appropriation of this character would not be open to that constitutional objection——

Mr. MANN. Of course, as far as this particular item is concerned, it is subject to a point of order from half a dozen different objections.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That may be true.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to make the point of order on that, but when the bill purports to be for the support of the Army and contains a provision in direct conflict with the Constitution, I think we ought to correct it, at least to make it conform with the Constitution.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If the gentleman wants to strike out the words "to be available until expended" and make it for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910——

Mr. MANN. As far as I am concerned I have no objection, and if the gentleman cares to offer that amendment I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, there is another objection to this provision, that I called attention to in the last session, and that is that it makes a permanent and definite appropriation. I do not see why that work can not be estimated for and paid out of the Treasury just the same as any other item. The geological survey that is being made in Alaska——

Mr. MANN. This does not make a definite appropriation as I understand it. It provides for $200,000 of appropriation to be paid from the receipts, etc.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is not that an appropriation of the receipts?

Mr. MANN. It is not definite.

Mr. TAWNEY. The amount is fixed.

Mr. MANN. From money now in the Treasury.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is from money now in the Treasury, not future receipts.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the necessity of making it a payment out of the specific receipts?

Mr. MANN. That is mere advertisement on the part of the committee—that that money comes in from that source.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; it was started that way from the beginning. I don't remember whether the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] wanted to confine it to what they had received or not, but some Member of Congress did when we originally started it and it was offered on the floor. The Committee on Military Affairs did not report it, and after a full discussion it was adopted in this manner and it has been carried in the same manner since, and I think it is as definite as you can make anything that might in the future grow to larger proportions than now contemplated, because as that great territory is opened up and new settlements are made, new small posts established to preserve peace, there will be an extension of this line of work. It seems to me it is as definite as you can make it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This extension is not for military purposes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Partly military and partly to connect up what we have there now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. After they have spent $500,000 for that purpose, as they have, does the gentleman not think they have built all the lines that are required for military purposes, and is not this clearly intended for the commercial interests of Alaska?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think not, so far as it is going yet, but undoubtedly it does benefit the commercial people there; but it is made necessary by the condition of the United States posts in Alaska.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Department is asking about the balance they claim is to their credit each year.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; the Department asked $400,000, and provided that it should run over another fiscal year, and we believed it was better for Congress to retain control each year and only give what they claimed they needed for next summer's work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the gentleman from Iowa any estimate of what it will cost to complete this telegraph for military purposes as distinct from purely commercial purposes?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think no one can give that information yet, but it is always in the power of Congress to stop work if it desires so to do, and, as I said a while ago, as long as that great Territory, in so large a measure unoccupied, is being gradually opened up and developed, the first thing to be done by the United States is to place some troops, some detachments, there to preserve order, and as they expand in their settlement they may expand in the desires for additional lines. But refusing to grant a larger sum, that would carry for at least two fiscal years, it is controlled by Congress all the time as to whether they will continue to make the appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman gives more for the ensuing fiscal year——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. For the ensuing fiscal year they asked for enough for at least two fiscal years, to be made available until expended. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, while I entered upon this line of legislation with a great deal of reluctance, yet the more I become familiar with the conditions in Alaska and with the conditions under which our people are struggling to develop and open and civilize it the more I become convinced that the small sums of money which Congress gives each year to aid in its development—for they have not the Territorial government and right of taxation they have in other Territories—these small sums do more good in advancing our civilization and helping our people than any like sums of money that are appropriated by the Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if there is a provision in the bill providing and authorizing the construction of military roads and appropriating money in Alaska for that purpose?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes, sir; there is, and I think I can convince the gentleman when we come to that that it is exceedingly desirable.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have no question about that, but this fact has been brought to my attention, and I did not know but what the same thing would apply to the work that is done in extending cables in Alaska which is provided for in this paragraph. The gentleman knows that during the summer months in Alaska they have practically twenty-four hours of daylight, but under a recent ruling of the Attorney-General the men who are in charge of this work can work their men only eight hours. The men are up in the wilds in Alaska and they have nothing to do, but they are absolutely prohibited, although the men are perfectly willing to work and the Government would be willing to pay them for their overtime or the time that they work over eight hours, and I think there ought to be some provision, both in respect to this paragraph and in respect to the other one in regard to the construction of roads, allowing the men in charge of that work to employ the men engaged in it for more than eight hours if we pay them for the overtime.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is one of the fields of legislation I do not care to enter at this time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I think it is a matter we ought to consider, both from the standpoint of the men and from the standpoint of the Government. It is a matter of humanity to the men the Government employs in this wild and uncivilized country. The work that is being done up there by the Government is costing the Government a great deal more in consequence of this decision, and it is taking a great deal more time, and thereby delaying these improvements that otherwise would be made, and I think you can not compare work of this character in Alaska with the Government work in the States.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I fully agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. TAWNEY. There are only a few months in the year when they can work, and these men ought to be permitted to work overtime when willing to do so. There is not any analogy at all with the conditions that have influenced Congress heretofore in the enactment of laws prohibiting men being employed more than eight hours.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman that we have had absolutely no information on that subject and no request on the part of the Department for any change in the present method of employment, and I think it would be very ill advised to undertake, without any more information than the committee has now, to go into that question and complicate our legislation with another question that is far reaching in many ways.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A proposition of that kind would be in many ways an amendment of existing law and subject to a point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I realize that. I will say to the gentleman that the gentleman in charge of this work, who is now in the city of Washington, and whom I know very well, called on me a few days ago and said that he had informed the Committee on Military Affairs of the condition in regard to the employment of labor up there, but did not know whether the committee would recommend any change in the existing law in that respect or not, and I supposed from that that the committee had been fully informed.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. He informed the committee as to the conditions of labor in Alaska, and stated the great expense and the great difficulty of laboring men contenting themselves there, but he did not ask us to change the law abrogating the eight-hour system, that I can remember now, at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know that he did ask your committee to change it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That matter was not brought to our attention at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. He refrained doubtless, as I recall the conversation, from making any recommendation in regard to the change, for the reason that the gentleman now says no change will be made.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It seems to me we ought to have more information than we can possibly get during the discussion of this bill before we would enter on that line of legislation.

Mr. TAWNEY. We are not entering upon any particular line of legislation, and there is no information that we do not now have that we could obtain. We know that during the few months that the employees of the Government engaged in the construction of these roads in Alaska can work they have practically daylight for twenty-four hours, and it is absolutely a hardship that we impose upon those men by not allowing them to work more than eight hours, and allowing them to stay up there in that wilderness for sixteen hours out of twenty-four without anything to do, and I thought it would be in the interest of the men, as well as the interest of the Government, to make some provision to allow them to work overtime.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think we had better let it alone.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the words "available until expended," lines 14 and 15, page 5, and then the gentleman can offer his amendment afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] admit the point of order is well taken?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is the same language that has been carried in the bill. If it is regarded obnoxious to the rule I have no objection to its going out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to sustain the point of order.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman, "to be available until the close of the fiscal year 1910."

Mr. TAWNEY. It will be available under the general law until that time. The covering-in act makes it available.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not unless it is contracted for before the close of the fiscal year.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the obligation is created during the fiscal year.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They would have to employ men and enter into contracts with them before the close of the next fiscal year to make a dollar of this available after the 30th of June, 1909. They do not do it by contract. They do it under the supervision of Army officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Insert "to be available until the close of the fiscal year 1910."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 14, after the word "War," insert "to be available until the close of the fiscal year 1910."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] that he strike out the part that provides that it shall be payable from the receipts of this system. Of course that is merely language——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I care nothing about that one way or the other, so that it is appropriated; but this gives us more in detail what they are doing there, and it is worth something, I think, to get it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The language that I refer to does not interfere with that. There is one part that requires a report to be made, but this language, to the effect that it is to be expended out of the receipts of the system, merely confuses people into believing that it is not actually costing the Government anything, when, of course, it does.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Of course it costs the Government just the amount. Let it go in this year. It is the usual language, and it strikes a responsive chord in the hearts of most everybody that we are helping Alaska and Alaska is helping herself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out, Mr. Chairman, commencing on line 15, with the word "from," down to and including the word "States," in line 17.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, lines 15, 16, and 17, strike out the words "from the receipts of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraphic system that have been covered into the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not care to discuss it; I only hope the motion will not be adopted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the reason for this amendment is this: Reading the provision in the bill, it would assume that there is no charge on the Treasury of the United States. As a matter of fact, there are many charges in addition to those contemplated in this appropriation upon the expenditures from the receipts.

The entire cost of the system, the operation of it, is paid out of the receipts of the system. An examination of the hearings discloses that up to date there have been turned into the Treasury some six hundred and odd thousand dollars, and that the Department has come and consistently asked not only that all the money covered into the Treasury be appropriated, but, as stated here, very nearly $200,000 more. The impression that would be received would be that we were paying for all of this out of the receipts, when as a matter of fact we are not. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] shakes his head, and says they ask for no more than the receipts. Of course I make that statement upon the assertion of the gentleman from Iowa, that they ask double the amount that is given in the bill; and if the gentleman will be patient for just a moment, I will explain that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Two hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars of net receipts are lying there, and it would be an appropriation of $200,000. There are receipts going in every month, net receipts after payment for these things. Our idea was that these were net receipts after paying all expenses covered into the Treasury, and that these receipts from time to time, as appropriated by Congress, and only these receipts, should be available for extensions and betterment of the line.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will just permit me to continue what I was stating. Up to December 1 there had been received $607,600. That is, the Treasury had received that amount from these receipts. Congress heretofore has appropriated $366,000 of the $607,000. This year the Department asked for $400,000, which was in excess of the amount.

Mr. YOUNG. If the gentleman will permit me, I will explain that that was to cover all the expenses for two years.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman is mistaken in that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think I have the facts very clearly in my mind. I am familiar with this appropriation. There have been several appropriations to extend this system, aggregating $369,000. The net receipts turned into the Treasury Department are $607,000. The Department asked the committee to give $400,000.

Mr. KAHN. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the gentleman from Iowa stated that the Department had asked double the amount that the committee had given.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I was mistaken in that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And that confirmed the statement I made at first, that the Department would consistently ask each year an amount of money to extend this system that would be equal to any supposed balance that might exist in the Treasury. It is a vicious way to legislate, to be pretending to do work out of receipts upon the theory that it does not cost the Government anything. We should appropriate out of the general funds the money required for this work, and not create additional, separate funds in the Treasury.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman has in mind the receipts of this cable go into the general fund of the Treasury, and this provision gives or assigns in advance this particular fund to do this particular work. Now, if the Federal Government should become insolvent, and that be a percentage of its obligation, this particular work is protected. I suppose that is the purpose of putting it in this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not understand the purpose except this. I am of the belief that the language is framed in this way to mislead Members of the House into the belief that it is not a charge upon the general fund in the Treasury. This House should be frank enough to appropriate for this extension out of the general fund in the Treasury and not create independent, separate funds, and create the impression that the business is done without any expense to the Government.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, these words are used only to assure the Members of the House that in appropriating whatever amount we do appropriate for this very year we do not exceed the net profits that have been made already from these lines.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman mean by that that the justification of the appropriation is to be based on the fact that you are getting that money from the lines?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Oh, no; not entirely. But when they first came for these appropriations for extending telegraph lines we thought it was something that would commend the appropriation to the House—to be able to tell them that the Government was not going into unknown expenditures in extending telegraph lines through Alaska, but was making the extension out of net receipts already received from the telegraph lines, and that is true. We have $238,000 there now of net receipts. We propose to appropriate $200,000 to the very best work, I think, almost that the Government can do, in the opening of this Territory to civilization and putting every camp into military communication.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman believe that the extension of this military telegraph system should depend upon the profits that are derived from its operation?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Not at all; but we think that is a justification of the expenditure, and also that it does no harm in the bill. It is a limitation upon the expenditure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; the amount of money appropriated is the limitation.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This is a limitation, if there is not that much received.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman says there is that much already in the Treasury, so it must be there; and the amount named is the limitation, not the language to which objection is made.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Some other year there might not be the amount there; and if the amount was not there, they would not get the money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It must be there, for the committee says it is there, and the officials say it is there. Otherwise the committee would not be reporting to appropriate out of a specific fund money that it believed did not exist.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to call the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey to the fact that this section does not refer to the profits derived from the operation of this telegraph and cable line, but to the receipts. I understood from the remarks of the chairman of the committee that the receipts from commercial sources were not equal to the cost of operation.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not regard this as profits, because we pay the Signal Corps, officers and men, out of the appropriation for the Army, and that is not taken into consideration; but this amount that is turned over is the amount of net profits, exclusive of the Signal Corps operation.

Mr. OLMSTED. What you mean is——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. What I mean is that if you were to deduct from these receipts the pay of the officers and enlisted force of the Signal Corps that operate these lines almost exclusively, that would then be a charge upon the receipts that, in my judgment, would not leave any net receipts.

Mr. OLMSTED. What you mean is that for the purposes of the post the Government must maintain this line anyway, and what they get from commercial use is so much velvet, so to speak.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Is clear profit.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean that the receipts are not covered into the Treasury, but that a part of them are used without being appropriated for by Congress?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. All the money that is received is covered into the Treasury, except that which is probably used there for the actual daily expenses.

Mr. MANN. That is the very question. The gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from New Jersey both referred to "net receipts." What authority have these officials to use any portion of the money that is paid to the Government of the United States, for any purpose, without being appropriated?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will read what it says here. On page 32 of the printed hearings on the Army appropriation bill

General Allen was asked what further expenditures would be made in the way of extension, and he replied:

That will depend on the development in Alaska. We have had two appropriations, one for $179,000 and one for $190,000, and are now asking for $200,000 more for further extensions and betterments of that system. The receipts from the cable in Alaska have thus far been $607,600. That much money was turned into the Treasury since 1904.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the gross receipts?

General ALLEN. Yes, sir. All money received is turned in. The expenses of the Alaskan system are paid from funds appropriated. As already stated, up to December 1 there had been received $607,600 and $369,000 had been appropriated, leaving a balance of $238,000 more money turned into the Treasury than has been reappropriated. The people there are now asking you to give them this year $200,000 to further extend the system.

Mr. MANN. So the use of the term "net receipts" by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] was inadvertent?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Not exactly.

Mr. MANN. Absolutely; because without the appropriation there could not be any such thing as net receipts.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is true in that sense.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; there could not be any such thing as net receipts, for the reason that the expense of the Signal Corps is not provided for in this special appropriation at all, but is carried in the pay of officers and men.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse officers traveling on duty in connection with the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system since January 1, 1904, for money paid by them for traveling expenses in excess of the mileage allowed them by law, $2,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph, which seems to be a claim.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is no doubt but that the point of order if insisted upon is good. It is not a claim, for this reason: An officer is ordered to go from one point to another, for which he gets mileage, and that is authorized by law. He would not have any claim on the Government except an equitable claim for any extra compensation, but matters of fact have been brought to our attention and I want to call the attention of the House to one, and there are many cases of this sort. Here is a case of an officer going on one trip where he was compelled to go in the performance of his duty. His mileage amounted to $4.60 and his expenses amounted to $90. If he had refused to go he would have been court-martialed.

The committee believes that taking the estimates of the Signal Corps of the money that is actually due, that they have been compelled to pay, where it has bankrupted officers in the service in Alaska, it ought to be reimbursed, and in another place in the bill we have made a provision covering travel in Alaska of $4.50 a day and expenses besides transportation. They are compelled to go with dog sleds. In trips of only a short distance it takes three or four days to make them, and it can not be done for less than $4.50 a day for subsistence alone, and when they have to employ dog sleds it costs excessively.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why is the limitation not contained in this paragraph that is found on page 20 that puts a limitation on it?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This is for money already expended, and it is to reimburse the men on the basis of their expenses. If it shall pass, we give them compensation in another provision for the future.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, these cases appealed particularly to the committee, and there can be no better statement of it than occurs on page 33 of the hearing, where General Allen tells of an officer who was sent out on duty and received $4.50 mileage and was compelled to pay out of his own pocket $90. There were several instances of that kind.

Mr. OLMSTED. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. OLMSTED. What is the mileage allowed by law?

Mr. HULL. Seven cents. Now, if the committee will pardon me, I would like to have a letter read simply for information of the committee from the Chief Signal Officer, General Allen.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER,
Washington, February 4, 1908.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Under date of March 6, 1906, while the Army bill was pending in Congress, Secretary Taft addressed a letter to the President of the Senate asking that provision be made for the payment of actual expenses to officers of the Army, contract surgeons, and dental surgeons when traveling on duty without troops in Alaska. As no action was taken at that time, under date of December 11, 1907, the letter was again forwarded to the Speaker of the House of Representatives recommending the insertion of such a provision in the Army appropriation bill for 1909. This letter is printed as Document No. 316, first session, Sixtieth Congress, House of Representatives.

There are a large number of cases in which officers have been required to expend very considerable amounts in excess of that received by them for mileage.

As an example may be mentioned the case of Captain Hartmann, whose trips in winter cost him $150 and $175 in summer, for which he received $24.

Lieutenant Voris's actual expenses from St. Michael to Nome and return were $207, for which he received $36.20. He was ordered to make two such trips each year, aggregating a loss, in his two years' service, of $683.20.

Each trip made by Lieutenant Hemphill inspecting the stations in the fourth section cost him $150, for which he received $57. On his inspections of stations in the third section his expenses were $300, for which he received $100.

Captain Clifton was recently ordered to make a trip, for which he says his expenses will be $100, and on his asking that some provision be made for reimbursing him, was informed that the Secretary of War had recommended to Congress that an appropriation be made for the payment of actual expenses, and unless some such action was taken there was no other way to afford him relief.

Captain Black left Valdez January 11, 1908, to make a trip of 1,150 miles by dog team to inspect the lines and stations. He estimates that he will be absent on this trip eighty-five days. His minimum expenses, estimated at $4.50 per day, would be $382.50, for which he would receive $46.

The journeys of these officers to inspect the lines and offices is absolutely necessary for the efficiency of the system, and unless some provision is made by legislation for paying their actual expenses there is absolutely no way by which they can be relieved from this excessive tax on their actual pay.

JAMES ALLEN,
Brigadier-General, Chief Signal Officer of the Army.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, why is not the money to be paid out of the receipts of this system?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Because it is paid as the gentleman desires, out of the Treasury.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is so inconsistent that I thought that perhaps there would be an amendment offered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I want, if I can, to obtain some information. This is a proposition to pay these gentlemen's traveling expenses in Alaska?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MANN. They got their traveling expenses on their way to Alaska?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How much?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Seven cents a mile.

Mr. MANN. It cost them nothing.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Didn't it?

Mr. MANN. They get transportation for nothing.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They paid their fare. If furnished transportation, they would get 4 cents a mile for other expenses.

Mr. MANN. Did they not travel on passes?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; they are not allowed passes.

Mr. MANN. Not always?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not at all now.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the railway rate law does not apply to the steamships engaged in this business. You propose to pay the officers on their way from Seattle to Alaska 4 or 7 cents a mile, 4 cents with transportation and 7 cents a mile without, and it is net profit mostly. Now, by this amendment, as soon as he strikes the shore of Alaska, where his expenses are greater than the transportation, you propose to pay him $4.50 a day expenses besides his transportation. Is that correct?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman makes a wrong statement——

Mr. MANN. Not intentionally.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Of course not; but I hardly think the gentleman would find 7 cents a mile any large source of profit. In the first place, if the Quartermaster's Department furnishes the officer transportation, he then gets 4 cents a mile for sleeping car and meals. There is no such thing, I think, and has not been for a couple of years, as passes to officers or even to Congressmen.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I take it that the gentlemen in this House who have made trips to Alaska on board the steamboats in the last few years have not paid their steamship fare.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; they paid for their meals, however.

Mr. MANN. I don't know; I have not been there.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They paid so much a day for board.

Mr. MANN. I think I am a good guesser on that subject.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If the gentleman had better terms than I had when I went there, I want the company to pay back some of the money that I paid when I went there. It is not fair to treat people differently. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that he paid his steamship fare on the trip from this country to Alaska?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I said I paid for my meals. They gave me transportation, as they did the other gentlemen, but I did not have to go. When you order soldiers there, they have got to go, and the companies do not hunt them up to give them transportation. They were hunting up Members of Congress and persuading them to go, believing it would develop a wider knowledge and better information about Alaska.

Mr. TAWNEY. It was for educational purposes. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It was for educational purposes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does this appropriation cover Members of Congress?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then how does that have any bearing on it?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This is brought in as an illustration of what had happened. But I think the gentleman is mistaken, Mr. Chairman, as to even the $4.50 a day being any profit under any conditions to these parties, and I think it will take all of that to the very last cent. I will say to him that the 7 cents a mile, and especially if the officer's wife accompanies him across the country, will not pay the expense that he is put to in moving to Alaska.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt about that, but that is not the case at all. Officers connected with this military cable travel back and forth between Alaska and this country and then a little in Alaska. Now, we propose to give them, under this proposition, the profit that is made when they travel between this country and Alaska and then pay their expenses in Alaska, so that they will keep the profit. It probably is not very great. I appreciate the hardship if the officer is stationed in Alaska and is compelled to travel around.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. My judgment is, Mr. Chairman, that it is not liable to that abuse. It is subject to a point of order. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MANN. There is no question about that.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No question in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of enlisted men of all grades, including recruits, $10,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I offer this pro forma amendment merely for the purpose of asking one or two questions of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman in charge of this bill. I have here the current number of Everybody's Magazine, in which the leading article is entitled "The lamb rampant," and it means by that the American nation, depicting us, from a military point of view, as a lamb which is shaking its tail in the face of the European nations. Now, the gentleman who writes this article is Lieut. Hugh Johnson, an officer of the Army of the United States. Therefore his remarks are entitled to respect. The article itself, I think, is one proper to be discussed on the floor of the House, because not only are the American people entitled to know our elements of weakness as well as those of strength, but so far as the foreign nations are concerned they probably already know a good deal more about our military defenses and preparations than does the average citizen of the United States.

So I think I am committing no impropriety in bringing this article to the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs and of the House. Now, the author of the article deals with a supposed invasion of the United States by two foreign nations with whom we are happily at peace and intend to remain so, and the tenor of the article is something like the famous English book entitled the "Battle of Dorking." It attempts to show what would happen in case our country is invaded, and the result prophesied by Lieutenant Johnson is dire disaster, owing, as he says, to our complete lack of preparation. He takes up first of all the lack of men in the Army, and he has put in here a number of pictures which are very instructive. Here is the first one, which is entitled "One hundred and fifty-eighth Company Coast Artillery, at the Presidio, San Francisco. This picture shows the command at Saturday morning inspection. There should be 109 enlisted men and 3 officers." As a matter of fact there are 11 men. Here is the next, "One hundred and Fortieth Company Coast Artillery," showing 6 men. "This small number is not unusual—it is the company normally present for parade and drill (infantry) when furnishing guard and fatigue drills. There should be 109 enlisted men and 3 officers." The next is "Third Battalion, Eleventh Infantry. There were 7 privates and 4 noncommissioned staff officers in this 'battalion' at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo., when the command was inspected recently by the Chief of Staff of the Army. There should be 512 enlisted men and 15 officers."

Here is a picture of a coast-guard gun, and he says "wooden blocks in the above photograph show places made vacant by men discharged during the year, who declined to reenlist, and whose places could not be filled by recruiting." Now, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether, so far as he knows, there is any accuracy in these statements.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think it is accurate, so far as the number of men are concerned. There is a wonderful shortage of the little army that is authorized by the order of the President fixing the minimum under the law. We are 22,000 men short, and the fact that all the long-term men are sent in the regiments that go to Alaska, go to the Philippines, or go to Cuba and the skeletons are kept at home—and this does not apply to coast defense so much as to the regular line of cavalry and infantry—until now we have a great many companies where it is like Artemus Ward's celebrated army, composed exclusively of officers. We have companies with three privates, with commissioned officers, and a few noncommissioned officers, and one of the provisions of this bill is to cure that by making it an inducement for the best class of men to enlist and give them more pay. If that should remain, in my judgment, in six months from now we will have an army of 62,000 enlisted men. They will be licked into shape very rapidly by these older noncommissioned officers and the few privates who are left to help us out in the work, and we will have an army that can be expanded up to 100,000 men and made effective in a very short time. Now, your accumulation of ammunition——

Mr. HARRISON. I was going to come to that in a few moments. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I will be glad to hear from him on that.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If we increase our Army on the terms of this bill, I have no hesitation in promising the country in six months from the time it becomes a law the Army will be recruited to its full number.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Iowa says that if the provision for the increase of pay of enlisted men remains in this bill we will be able to recruit our Army up to the limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the time may be extended for five or ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. For five or ten minutes?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. For ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] None is heard.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This comes out of the time of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman is quite willing to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota to interrogate the chairman of the committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask the gentleman whether it is not entirely possible to accomplish what he desires, without this provision being carried in this bill, by his committee bringing in a bill for an increase in the pay of the enlisted men in the Army and passing that bill and let it become a law instead of carrying it in this appropriation bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, there is no question but it would have the same effect exactly if the separate bill should become the law.

Mr. SLAYDEN. May I ask a question of the chairman of the committee?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, if it is not true that within the last three months enlistments have increased very rapidly? Is it not true that this panic, for which we have heard no political party is responsible, has had the effect of filling up the depleted ranks of the Army very rapidly?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will answer that I have had that impression, but I have interviewed the present Adjutant-General of the Army, who to my mind is one of the ablest and most painstaking officers we have connected with the Military Establishment, General Ainsworth, and he said that the enlistments have increased very rapidly, and that they always increase rapidly at this season of the year. He referred to the large increases as "snowbirds," that are not as desirable a class as many others, and that they come into the Army in the winter and desert in the summer. Now, we want to get rid of the "snowbirds" as fast as we can and get the same class of men in the Army that we had before the Spanish-American war, when one of the attachés representing England, who was on the battlefields of Cuba, said that, man for man, our little Army of 25,000 men was unexcelled among all the nations of the earth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] attribute the inability to recruit men entirely to the low pay or does not he believe that the way the Army has been worked, to an excessive degree, has resulted in men refusing to enlist?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think the overwork of the Army has had something to do with it, but above all the things that have contributed to the lack of enthusiasm for enlistment is the fact that our noncommissioned officers have such a low rate of pay that they themselves would not reenlist, and when we have raised them to the standard they should occupy, with their influence over the men and their association with them, their knowledge of how to treat the men, it will make such a marked improvement in the administration of affairs in the Army that we will have no further trouble in the future.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My information is that a considerable number of the men are so disappointed at the way they are compelled to work under the new system that they leave the Army as quickly as they can and refuse to go back.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, it was for the very purpose of eliciting this information that I introduced the subject this afternoon, and I was glad to hear what the chairman on Military Affairs had to say. I sincerely trust that this provision, increasing the pay of enlisted men, will become law, and that it will have the result of filling up the depleted ranks in our Army. This author, however, in writing this article, has, in the first place, taken no account of the American Navy. Even supposing our Navy were outmaneuvered or——

Mr. SHERLEY. Is this a criticism of the Army?

Mr. HARRISON. It is a criticism of our unpreparedness for war.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps the reason there is no criticism of the Navy is on account of the reception that similar criticism has received heretofore. Does the gentleman think it proper for an officer to criticize the Army?

Mr. HARRISON. I would prefer to have the gentleman express his own opinion on that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think there is no objection to an officer of the Army or the Navy criticising what is wrong in the service, in order that it may be remedied. There has been so much talk the other way, that there is something sacred about our military and naval service, I thought the gentleman might enlighten us on that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, the author of this article fails to take into account what I consider the most important fact in the whole situation. If our territory were threatened for an instant by a foreign foe, millions of men would spring to the defense of the country. Every able-bodied man in the United States would at once offer his services, and our Army, from being one of the smallest standing armies in the world, would become one of the biggest and most important armies the civilized world has ever seen. I think we need have no fear for want of men. The United States breeds a fine race of men and the best soldiers the world has ever seen, but there is another side of this article that I want to take up in the few moments that are left to me by the courtesy of the committee, and that is the shortage of guns, ammunition, and equipment. Here is a picture of a 12-inch coast-defense gun.

The author says:

To erect a plant for the manufacture of this most necessary gun would take from two to three years. To make the gun takes eighteen months; to erect a plant for making the gun carriage would take a year; to make the carriage takes about eight months. With present facilities, from eight to twelve guns could be made in a year.

Then there is a picture of a depleted battery of horse artillery. He says that the material shown consists of 2 guns, 2 caissons, 2 kit wagons, and 55 horses. There should be 4 guns and 190 men.

Here is a picture of Field Artillery in action, of which he says:

We have about 200 of these guns, about one-sixth of the number that we had during the civil war. Six of these batteries complete were bought abroad at a comparatively recent date. Now they can be made at Bethlehem and other steel works and assembled by the Government. The assembling requires four months for each gun, and we could, after the first four months, turn out seventeen a month.

Now, the author very justly says if a foreign military government proposed to attack the United States with the fine modern steamships that are now used they might land and supply troops on either the coast of the Atlantic or the Pacific oceans in ten days, while it is going to take eight months at least, and perhaps two years, for our Government to prepare the guns necessary to resist the advance.

Later in the article he gives us a picture of what would happen in our Army in the event of war:

Arms and equipment will not be forthcoming. Equipment for even one-fifth enough infantry does not exist. Rifles, hardtack, guns, shrapnel, saddles, uniforms, tents, clothing, haversacks, belts, bayonets, sabers, all the jumbled circumstance of war will have to be manufactured after the outbreak of hostilities.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is a very grave question, and as this magazine is very widely circulated, it is calculated to produce some apprehension on the part of the public. I do not think anybody should be condemned for offering criticism in these matters, and especially when such criticism has a bearing on the equipment of our Army and the national defense. I hope the chairman of the committee has some response he will care to make to this line of criticism.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. A reply to that article belongs to the Committee on Appropriations, all that part referring to the coast defense.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. The men to man the guns depend upon the gentleman's committee.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The part referring to the small guns and infantry belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs. The article is not correct. So far as the infantry and cavalry are concerned, we have an accumulation now of over 600,000 guns, not all of a modern type, but with the Krag-Jörgensen, which, with a little addition, is substantially as good as the other, and could be used with the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. One minute, until I get through with this, if my friend will wait. General Crozier reports that in another year they will have enough guns to equip the entire Regular Army and militia with new guns and have, with Krag-Jörgensens, over 600,000 stand.

Mr. YOUNG. That is right.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. He is accumulating ammunition at the rate of 14,500,000 rifle ball cartridges each year, and could largely increase that if necessity became apparent. He wants a total reserve of 180,000,000 rounds to completely equip and arm 600,000 men. But I want to say that we are only working about one-third of the time now in the manufacture of our ammunition and our guns; but by putting on two more shifts we could equip a regiment a day, not everyone with the modern arms, but with the aid of the Krag-Jörgensens, which is only different in the range of the ball and the trajectory.

In other words, the new rifle, shooting 2,000 yards, is more likely to hit an intermediate object than is the Krag-Jörgensen. In other words, it has a flatter trajectory. The Krag-Jörgensen bullet, on account of a smaller powder charge behind it, must go higher up into the air to reach a given point; but this difference is not great, and the Krag-Jörgensen is a very accurate rifle and an exceedingly efficient weapon. We have 400,000 Krag-Jörgensens and 331,000 of the new rifle, so that we have more than 700,000 rifles to-day which are modern in all respects. We have an accumulation of ammunition that would be ample, so far as the smaller arms are concerned, for an army of four or five hundred thousand men, and they could be kept going by the increased output of the enlarged force of workmen that would at once go to work. So that I do not anticipate danger in that respect. The Committee on Military Affairs took up the question as to the deterioration of ammunition. We were fearful to accumulate such a large amount, but we were assured by General Crozier that under the modern processes of the manufacture of ammunition and the care that is taken they have not been able to detect the slightest deterioration in the ammunition which is accumulated; and it is intended by the committee to give to this Ordnance Department, as we have been doing for the last eight years, every dollar that they ask for munitions of war, so that this Government will be prepared in case of the outbreak of hostilities.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for extending to me sufficient time in which to carry on this discussion, and I thank the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, for the statement he has made. I think it is due to the public that some answer should be made to an article of so disquieting a nature in a leading magazine, and I think the gentleman has satisfactorily answered many of the criticisms therein.

Of course our Army is not perfect, and of course we have not an army to-day which is equal to some of the armies of foreign nations; but I thank heaven we have not, and I thank heaven that we are not groaning under the military burdens of foreign monarchies, and that the best muscle, brawn, and brain of this country are not tied up in doing empty military service and in dress parade. The American people are best employed as they are employed now, in furthering the industries and prosperity of this country, and not in senseless military displays. But it is a thing to cause apprehension to suggest that we have not enough equipment, even though we have men enough for an effective army, and it seems to me that in time of peace we can not be too careful in preparing for war, and that our preparation must be especially directed to acquiring sufficient arms and equipment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, if there be no objection, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter the monthly pay of enlisted men of the Army during their first enlistment shall be as follows, namely: Master electricians, master signal electricians, $75; engineers, $65; regimental sergeants-major, regimental quartermaster-sergeants, regimental commissary-sergeants, sergeants-major senior grade Coast Artillery, battalion sergeants-major of engineers, post quartermaster-sergeants, post commissary-sergeants, post ordnance-sergeants, battalion quartermaster-sergeants of engineers, sergeants first class Hospital Corps, electrician sergeants first class, sergeants first class Signal Corps, and first sergeants, $45; battalion sergeants-major of infantry and field artillery, squadron sergeants-major, sergeants-major junior grade Coast Artillery, battalion quartermaster-sergeants, field artillery, and master gunners, $40; electrician sergeants second class, sergeants of engineers, ordnance, and Signal Corps, quartermaster-sergeants of engineers, and color sergeants, $36; sergeants and quartermaster-sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, sergeants of the Hospital Corps, firemen, and cooks, $30: Provided, That mess sergeants shall receive $6 per month in addition to their pay; corporals of engineers, ordnance, Signal Corps, and Hospital Corps, chief mechanics, and mechanics Coast Artillery, $24; corporals of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, mechanics of field artillery, blacksmiths and farriers, saddlers, wagoners, and artificers, $21; privates, first class, of engineers, ordnance, Signal Corps, and Hospital Corps, $18; privates Hospital Corps, $16; trumpeters, musicians of infantry, artillery, and engineers, privates of cavalry, artillery, infantry, Signal Corps, and privates second class, engineers and ordnance, $15.

Mr. TAWNEY, Mr. HAY, and others reserved a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved by several gentlemen.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is no doubt that this paragraph is subject to a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order made?

Mr. HAY. Reserving the point of order, I desire to make a statement—that is, if the gentleman in charge of the bill wishes to go on any longer this evening. It is now 10 minutes after 5 o'clock.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We will only go on a few minutes longer.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to state the purpose, as I understand it, of this appropriation. It is to keep the noncommissioned officers in the Army. The pay of noncommissioned officers has been increased very materially. According to a statement made in the Adjutant-General's office, there are 16,248 noncommissioned officers, and the increased pay under this provision is largely on account of these officers. Undoubtedly the purpose for which the provision is put in will be carried out. The noncommissioned officers will, in all probability, stay in the Army, but the slight additional pay of $2 a month given to the private soldier will not, in my judgment, keep the private soldier in the Army. Officers of the Army of very high rank and of long experience tell me that on account of the way in which the private soldier is worked it is hopeless to expect him to remain in the Army.

These men do not enlist to work, and with their practice marches and their garrison schools they are kept at work all the time. You will not be able to get a man to enlist in the Army as a private soldier for $15 a month. It is true that under the provisions of this bill a man at the end of his first enlistment will get an increase of $3 on account of it. But we are also told by Army officers that if the soldier is not made a noncommissioned officer by the end of his first enlistment he is not of much account as a soldier. Therefore I say that the increase of $2 a month provided for in this bill will not suffice to keep the Army up in point of numbers as high as it ought to be kept.

Now, further, these practice marches, these garrison schools, instead of being done away with in the Army, are insisted upon more and more by the gentlemen who now control the policy of the Army, so that I do not believe that any good result will come as far as the private soldier is concerned from an increase of pay. I do believe, however, that the 16,248 noncommissioned officers will be kept perhaps in the Army and will serve as a nucleus around which, in time of war, if necessary, a good, serviceable Army can be built up.

I want to call attention again to the fact that in this legislation we are not only increasing the pay of the Army $3,900,000, but that increase will become larger every year under the provisions of this bill, for up to the seventh enlistment the noncommissioned officers' and privates' pay increases. Next year it will be $4,500,000, and the year after that it will be over $5,000,000, and so on, and in time of war, if we have a large Army, the expense to this country will be incalculable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks that the time of the gentleman from Virginia be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. During the civil war the private soldier up to the 1st of May, 1864, received $13 a month. From the 1st of May, 1864, down to January, 1870, the private soldier received $16, and then it was put back to $13 a month. So that even in that war the amount that was paid to the private soldier was comparatively small. But if this provision prevails, and there should be a war, the expense to this country would be enormous. I think Members of the House ought to think of all these matters before they vote these provisions into the bill.

I believe something should be done to encourage enlistment in the Army, and I for one would not take the responsibility of making a point of order against this provision in the bill; nor do I think it would be right after this length of time, although it may now be inopportune, to increase the pay of the enlisted man. I believe that, so far as the noncommissioned officers are concerned at least, the pay ought to be increased—whether to the extent that is provided for in this bill I am not prepared to say, because you will see, if you examine it, that the increased pay amounts in a great many instances to nearly 100 per cent. For instance, the first sergeant now receives $25 a month, and under the provisions of this bill he receives $45 a month; and so I might go through the whole gamut of noncommissioned officers and show in almost every instance an increase very much larger than it ought to have been. However, I will not undertake to offer now, nor could I offer, intelligent amendments along that line.

I have simply made this statement so that Members—and particularly this side of the House—should know what we are doing when we vote this appropriation into the bill.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman give us a more definite idea of the salary or pay for the officers whom he thinks has been increased too much?

Mr. HAY. I think that they have all been increased, a great many of them more than 100 per cent.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not so much as that.

Mr. HAY. Not all of them. The first sergeant has been increased $25 to $45.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is not 100 per cent.

Mr. HAY. And finally the pay will be $56 a month under the provisions of this bill, if he serves nine years.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that the increase from $13 to $15 for the enlisted man is excessive?

Mr. HAY. I do not think so, but I do not think that it will subserve the purpose for which it is done.

Mr. MANN. Take the corporals. Of course we can not tell from reading the bill what the increase is. I have examined some of the figures as to what the present pay is, but the man does not live on this earth, in my judgment, who can tell what the pay of any officer of the Army is in the end.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman is correct about that—either noncommissioned or commissioned.

Mr. MANN. Take the corporals. Can the gentleman give us any idea of what the increase for the ordinary corporal is—whether it is a proper increase?

Mr. HAY. I think the increase to the corporal is not too large. It is something like 40 per cent; but the gentleman must remember that at the end of each year, if the corporal reenlists, there is added to his pay $3 per month, and not only that but he gets three months' pay as a bounty for reenlisting, under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. HAY. So that everything has been done along this line as has been done in the Navy to try and get these men to reenlist, to stay in the Army.

Mr. MANN. I figured the other day, myself, that an enlisted man under this bill might receive $30 a month.

Mr. HAY. That is true; at the end of the seventh enlistment.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The enlisted man gets $25.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; and $5 extra pay if he is some character of a marksman, or something of that kind, so that he can get $30 a month.

Mr. HAY. Yes; that is what he can get.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. DALZELL] having taken the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman

GALENA, ILL., February 24, 1908.

Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM,
Senator from Illinois.

DEAR SIR: The Rock River Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, consisting of 336 ministers, representing 400 churches, with over 60,000 communicants, at its last regular session adopted the following attached resolutions, and instructed me as its secretary to forward them to you:

"Whereas the testimony in the hearing in the matter of the protest against the seating of Mr. REED SMOOT before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate revealed the fact that Joseph F. Smith, president of the Church of Latter Day Saints, commonly known as the 'Mormon Church,' and other officials and members of that church, continue to live in polygamy (a polygamous child having been born to President Smith since he gave his testimony before the Senate committee) in violation of the pledge given to the nation in 1891 by the apostles of the church, that polygamy and polygamous practices should cease if amnesty were granted their people for past violations of laws prohibiting polygamy and polygamous practices; and

"Whereas the defiant and persistent violation of laws by Mormon polygamists shows that the States in which Mormons are in power are not and will not be able to cope with this evil; and

"Whereas President Roosevelt in his message to Congress, December, 1906, said: 'It is neither safe nor proper to leave the question of polygamy to be dealt with by the several States; power to deal with it should be conferred on the National Government;' and the President recommended submission of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting polygamy: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Rock River Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, That we respectfully request the Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM and Hon. ALBERT J. HOPKINS, members of the National Senate from the State of Illinois, of which the ministers and members of the Methodist churches of this conference are citizens, to introduce, advocate, and vote for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting polygamy and polygamous cohabitation, the same to be submitted to the several States for ratification.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of this conference to the Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM and ALBERT J. HOPKINS, Senators from the State of Illinois."

INTERSTATE-COMMERCE REGULATIONS.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, before passing from the order of reports of committees I wish to say just a word. I ask the attention of the Committee on Interstate Commerce to a little bill that is very dear to me, which was referred to that committee on the 4th day of December last, and so far as I can discover it has been slumbering there without a particle of disturbance ever since.

Mr. President, I do not doubt that the committee is disposed to treat the bill with utmost good faith. It is Senate bill 426. It proposes to amend the interstate-commerce law to this extent, that when a notice shall be given by a transportation line of its intention to increase a rate or change a practice, a shipper shall have a right to protest, and thereupon the change shall not be made without a hearing.

I understand that the Interstate Commerce Commission has recommended an amendment to the effect that it be left to the discretion of the Commission as to whether or not a stay of proceedings shall be granted. I am perfectly content to accept that amendment. I only wish to urge the committee to take up the measure and give it that degree of attention which its importance demands and which the great body of the people are petitioning shall be done. I am receiving petitions and letters every day urging that some action be taken in this matter.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly. I am glad to yield. The Senator is a member of that committee, and I should like to hear a voice from it.

Mr. CLAPP. Knowing the intense interest of the chairman of the committee in that bill, I hardly think it proper that the subject should be brought up at this time. It seems to me the Senator's remarks ought to be withheld until the chairman can be here.

Mr. FULTON. I was approaching the proposition of the absence of the chairman of the committee. I see that he is absent just at this moment from the Chamber, and for that reason I hesitated about bringing the matter up, but, realizing that the committee meets to-morrow, I can not refrain from expressing the hope that the committee will take up the bill and give it consideration with a view of reporting it back to the Senate before the expiration of the present session. I do not wish, of course, to question the perfect sincerity and good faith of the committee. I know that it has a vast amount of work to do; but, Mr. President, people are asking for this bill, and I think I am justified in thus calling the attention of the committee to it. Indeed, I can not consent that it shall be much longer retained by the committee.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in the absence of the chairman, it seems only proper that I should state that parties in favor of the bill, and I think some, perhaps, who have objections to the bill, desire to be heard, and the chairman has arranged to give them a hearing. The committee is working on the bill in connection with its other work, and I think is moving the matter along as rapidly as it can be moved in view of the fact that parties have desired to be heard upon it before it is reported.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator's remarks are quite pertinent and proper. Parties are entitled to be heard and to be given a reasonable length of time. I submit that they can not be heard unless the committee meets and gives them a hearing.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I only wish to say a word in reference to the bill the Senator refers to. I happened to be acting as chairman at the last meeting when the bill was considered or, at least, brought up. The subcommittee which have the bill in charge was at one time ready to report, as I understood it, and was prevented from doing so on account of the desire on the part of people to be heard, and they took the bill back to hold it until the hearing was over. They fully intended to report it just as soon as they could after that. So I want to assure the Senator from Oregon there was no sort of feeling on the part of anyone as far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. FULTON. I am sure of that. It is only that in the multitude of business I am afraid this little measure will be lost sight of, and I wanted to call the attention of Senators to its importance. I am glad to be assured that the bill will be given consideration, and I hope it will be shortly reported.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the succeeding Monday suit the convenience of the Senator?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I would not object to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I would make it Monday, the 9th day of the month.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have no disposition, and I do not believe there is any disposition on the part of any Senator in the Chamber on either side, to unnecessarily defer action on the bill. But the bill has been reported to the Senate at such a time that it has been impracticable to confer with Senators to see who, if any, desire to speak upon it. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will not defer his request until some inquiry can be made on that subject?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will be pleased to do so, Mr. President; and in the meantime I will ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the routine morning business, the bill may be laid before the Senate for further consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid before the Senate for consideration immediately after the close of the routine morning business on Monday next. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. SMITH. I ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 102) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish three condemned cannon to the mayor of the city of Detroit, Mich., to be placed on the base of the statue of the late Maj. Gen. Alexander Macomb, United States Army.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MATERIAL AND EQUIPMENT FOR PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I understand that we are now considering the Calendar under Rule VIII?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that order of business No. 204, being Senate joint resolution No. 40, to provide for the transportation by sea of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal, may be passed over without prejudice. I give notice that I shall call it up for action at the earliest possible day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Maine will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the first bill on the Calendar.

MINING TECHNOLOGY BRANCH IN GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

The joint resolution (S. R. 35) to provide for a mining technology branch in the Geological Survey was announced as first in order.

Mr. KEAN. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over without prejudice.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

The bill (S. 4030) to fix the pay of the Army was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 28) to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports and to promote commerce," was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

TRACK CONNECTION WITH THE WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

The bill (S. 3976) to authorize and require the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company to maintain and operate a track connection with the United States navy-yard in the city of Washington, D. C., was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is very important that that bill should be acted upon to-day. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] is not now present, and I ask that it may temporarily go over, to be recurred to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

The bill (S. 2695) to amend the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," and the acts amendatory thereof, was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," and the acts amendatory thereof, by adding the following to section 1 of that act as amended:

When a State contains more than one district or a district contains more than one division and there are two or more defendants residing in different districts or divisions of the same State, the action may be brought in either division or district in which either of the defendants may reside, and an alias writ may be issued by the clerk against the defendant or defendants residing in the other district or division of the State than that of the court in which the action is brought, directed to the marshal of any other district of that State in which any defendant resides; and such alias writs, when executed and returned into the office from which they issue, shall constitute proper service, and upon judgment or decree rendered therein execution may be issued, directed to the marshal of any district in the same State.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 4132) creating an additional land district in the State of South Dakota was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

PACIFIC PEARL MULLETT.

The bill (S. 1517) for the relief of Pacific Pearl Mullett, administratrix of the estate of the late Alfred B. Mullett, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, when that bill was last reached on the Calendar I asked that it might go over. I did so because I know something of the case, and I wish to say just a word about it. I think the bill ought to go over to a day when we can give it enough time to have the report read. This is a claim which has been standing for a long time. Congress did at one time appropriate a certain amount of money in full of this claim, and the money was accepted. This claim has also been before the courts in one form or another, and it has been thrown out there. Therefore it seems to me that we ought not to consider the bill until we can give it time enough to have the report read. I have not read the report, and I have not given the matter any attention for a number of months, or years, perhaps, but I know that that condition pertains, and I therefore ask that the bill go over under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the Calendar under Rule IX, at the request of the Senator from Nebraska.

H. A. ELDRED.

The bill (S. 2729) for the relief of H. A. Eldred was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to negotiate with the allottee or allottees upon whose land the improvements heretofore made by H. E. Eldred, of Mendocino County, State of California, in the Round Valley Indian Reservation, have been placed, not to exceed 11 acres in area, for the sale of such land to the said H. E. Eldred upon terms to be agreed upon by the allottee or allottees and the said Eldred and to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, the restrictions, if any existing as to the alienation of any land in such allotments, are hereby removed, to the extent that said allottee or allottees may convey said 11 acres to the said Eldred.

SEC. 2. This act to take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate for the sale of certain Indian lands to H. E. Eldred."

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 15219, being the Indian appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the committee will be considered from the beginning, the Senate having reconsidered its action agreeing to the amendments extending to the amendment on page 6 of the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "President," on page 2, line 13, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which $15,000 shall be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the President to cause, under the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians," such Indian reservations as in his judgment are advantageous for agricultural and grazing purposes to be surveyed or resurveyed, for the purposes of said act, and to complete the allotment of the same, including the necessary clerical work incident thereto in the field and in the Office of Indian Affairs, and delivery of trust patents, so far as allotments shall have been selected under said act, $75,000, of which $15,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Secretary," on page 3, line 1, after the word "purchase," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter supplies may be purchased, contracts let, and labor employed for the construction of artesian wells, ditches, and other works for irrigation, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, without advertising as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the other day, when this bill was taken up, I called attention to this remarkable provision, especially the words "and other works for irrigation." The whole provision is very loosely drawn, and as it is stretchable to almost any degree of Executive discretion and changes existing law, unless the chairman of the committee can give a very cogent reason why it should go in, I am going to make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I explained this matter the other day, but as some Senators are now here who were not here then, I shall make the explanation again. This is not a new feature in legislation. There are two classes of supplies which the Indian Office has to purchase. One is the regular supplies for the Indian schools and agencies, in relation to which there is a provision of law, that wherever the amount exceeds $500 at any time notice also must be given. The Indian Office is also carrying out some irrigation plans on a small scale in connection with Indian reservations, and in the law making appropriations for the Indian service for the year ending June 30, 1908, there is found this provision:

Provided, That hereafter supplies may be purchased, contracts let, and labor employed for the construction of artesian wells, ditches, and other works for irrigation, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, without advertising, as hereinbefore provided.

For some reason, I do not undertake to say why, that provision was omitted from the bill as it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives, and at the suggestion of the Indian Office, the suggestion being found on page 8 of the report on this bill, the Senate committee inserted the provision. The language of the suggestion of the Department is as follows:

Authority has been conferred in the appropriation acts for twelve or fourteen years for the Secretary of the Interior to purchase supplies, let contracts, and employ labor for irrigation, and a similar provision was in the estimates.

This authority is of great convenience, especially in reservations remote from trade centers, as the laws governing this Office in procuring supplies and materials require that the advertising shall run for a period of three weeks. The present form of the provision seems to be what is needed.

I do not know that I care to add anything to that. It has been the law for some time. It was left out in the House bill, and the Senate committee inserted it partly because it had been the law and partly at the request of the Department.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee this question: Has it been the custom in years past that the Secretary of the Interior has been allowed unlimited authority under the law for the letting of contracts for the construction of these irrigation works upon Indian reservations?

Mr. CLAPP. The first part of the Senator's question I was not able to hear.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask for information whether or not is has been the custom for the law to provide that the Secretary of the Interior may go on with the construction of these large irrigation works on Indian reservations with no more restriction than is proposed in this amendment?

Mr. CLAPP. Substantially; yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Well, does not the chairman of the committee think it would be well to limit the amount to some reasonable figure? Some of these irrigation works which we are now constructing on Indian reservations run up into the hundreds of thousands of dollars for an individual enterprise.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And does the chairman of the committee think that that discretion should be lodged absolutely in the Secretary of the Interior? I suppose that it is inserted for the purpose of providing for the smaller contingencies of such works and the smaller expenses; but, as I read this amendment, there would be nothing in the world to prevent the Secretary from making all sorts of contracts, even up to the limit of the work provided by Congress.

Mr. CLAPP. I call the Senator's attention again to the fact that, while this provision appears in the bill as an amendment, it is simply a repetition of the provision which has heretofore existed, especially in the bill of last year. As to whether it is wise to give the Secretary that latitude is a question the Senate must determine. For myself, realizing that these enterprises are conducted, as a rule, at a distance from any center, frequently at some distance from any railroad station or depot, and that it is difficult to anticipate the amount which may be required—personally I would be in favor of giving the Secretary this latitude. It is, however, purely a question for the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In view of the circumstances he has mentioned, would the Senator object to an amendment fixing a limit at $10,000?

Mr. CLAPP. Personally I would not object; but I do not know whether it would embarrass the Department. We might fix that limit for the present, and if the Department feels that it would be thereby embarrassed, it could bring the matter specifically before us before the bill is finally passed. If the Senator desires to make the amendment, I will not interpose any objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the fundamental question involved here is whether or not it is a wise governmental policy to put such discretion in the hands of any officer. I do not see the cogency of the argument that the remoteness of these works and the lack of facilities for publicity makes it necessary for the amendment proposed by the committee. There is no hurry. There is no life and death matter involved, and the safe and reasonable and customary method of advertising for bids can do no harm. Therefore, I do not think that after reflection the Senator from Wyoming will consider that even $10,000 is a proper limit. The law as it is cited on the preceding page provides for advertising in contracts for anything exceeding $500; and that has been the law time out of mind. If we put a bad provision in the bill last year, there is no reason why we should reenact it. Naturally, the Indian Department would like a free hand and be permitted to make contracts for supplies without any supervision. Do they make specific, definite, and detailed reports to anybody?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly; they make reports to the Department showing the details of every expenditure. Nor must it be understood that this provision was only in the bill of last year. I have not the other laws before me. I have simply the statement, however, of the Department that it has been the law for a number of years.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a little odd that, when the House in making up this bill, with the last year's appropriation bill before it, should see fit to strike this out, we should simply put it back because it had crept into the other appropriation bills. Therefore I will insist on the point of order that the amendment changes existing law and is likely to increase expenditures, and let the President rule on it.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the Senator is making a mistake. It would very much embarrass the Department.

Mr. TILLMAN. In what way?

Mr. CLAPP. We already concede a latitude to the Department, small though it be.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of $500.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do you want to concede them a latitude of $500,000? That is what this would do.

Mr. CLAPP. Does the Senator say the amendment does that?

Mr. TILLMAN. Do you want to do that?

Mr. CLAPP. I am not making that point. I have agreed, so far as I am personally concerned, to the limitation of $10,000; but if that is too much there should be, instead of striking this provision out and, no matter what the contingency might be, leaving the Department powerless to proceed until they advertised three weeks, we ought at least in this bill to give them as much latitude as we give them in the purchase of those supplies, the amount of which would be anticipated for months.

Mr. TILLMAN. This relates specifically to irrigation works, and irrigation works are very slow-motion affairs. They never get into a fever. There is not any exigency or emergency about them.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will not make the point of order, whether it be well or ill taken, for there are certain contingencies in which, in my judgment, the Secretary of the Interior should be allowed to act quickly. As the Senator in charge of the bill has stated, some of these works are in places remote from supplies, or remote from places where advertisement can promptly be resorted to. For instance, in case of a freshet washing away part of the irrigation work, where, in order to prevent further disaster, immediate action should be taken, I think that the Secretary should be allowed to expend more than $500. I do not think, however, that he should be given unlimited control over the funds, and, therefore, I propose an amendment after the word "irrigation," in line 4, page 3, to insert, "not to exceed the sum of $5,000 in any one purchase or contract." I can well imagine that there might be cases when the discretion of the Secretary ought to be exercised at once, and for that reason I offer the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, $5,000 is too much, but if the Senator from his knowledge of conditions and experience in such matters feels that that is essential, I do not want to obstruct any reasonable legislation here that will be in the interest of economy and of prompt action. Suppose the Senator puts it at $2,000? That would stop lots of breaks in a ditch.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It would not stop very many breaks very rapidly in large irrigation works.

Mr. TILLMAN. From what I saw out there they do not often break.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator is mistaken. They very often break, and it has occurred to me, Mr. President, that the Secretary might well be allowed to use his discretion within the limits proposed by my amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I yield to the superior discretion and wisdom of my friend from Wyoming.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina withdraw the point of order?

Mr. TILLMAN. I withdraw the point of order upon the understanding that the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming fixing the limit at $5,000 goes in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina withdraws his point of order. The Senator from Wyoming proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 4, in the committee amendment, after the word "irrigation," it is proposed to insert the words "not to exceed the sum of $5,000 in any one purchase or contract."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 3, after line 8, to insert:

Hereafter when the Secretary of the Interior deems a new bond necessary he may, in his discretion, require any disbursing officer under the jurisdiction of the Office of Indian Affairs to execute a new bond, with approved sureties, in such amount as he may deem necessary, and when accepted and approved by the Secretary of the Interior the new bond shall be valid and the surety or sureties of the prior bond shall be released from liability for all acts or defaults of the principal which may be done or committed from and after the day on which the new bond was approved.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill if in line 11 it would not be better to insert the word "Commissioner" for "Office," so that it would read "under the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs" instead of "under the jurisdiction of the Office of Indian Affairs." Would that not be better?

Mr. CLAPP. There would certainly be no objection to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that change, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 11, after the words "of the," it is proposed to strike out the word "Office" and insert the word "Commissioner."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 3, after line 18, to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior shall take possession of all buildings now or heretofore used for governmental, school, or other tribal purposes, together with the furniture therein and the land appertaining thereto, and appraise and sell the same at such time and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and deposit the proceeds, less expenses incident to the appraisement and sale, in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the respective tribes: Provided, That in the event said lands are embraced within the geographical limits of a State or Territory of the United States such State or Territory or any county or municipality therein shall be allowed one year from date of establishment of said State or Territory within which to purchase any such lands and improvements within their respective limits at not less than the appraised value. Conveyances of lands disposed of under this section shall be executed and delivered in like manner and with like effect as herein provided for other conveyances. And this provision shall apply to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator who has this bill in charge whether the statement in the amendment is not rather too broad, and whether there should not be something to limit it. As I understand, it is intended to relate to tribal property, property in reservations, so that it shall not be applied to schools outside of reservation schools. I believe that is the intention of it, but it seems to me the terms are very broad.

Mr. CLAPP. There would be no objection whatever to making it more definite. This was an old law. It was passed some years ago. Afterwards it was amended so as not to take effect for one year after the dissolution of the tribal governments. Then the Department recommended that the original law be amended. By repealing the amending law it would have complicated the appearance of it, so the original law was reenacted. Now it reads:

Shall take possession of all buildings now or heretofore used for governmental, school, or other tribal purposes.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator who has the bill in charge thinks that is sufficiently limited, I do not wish to interfere.

Mr. CLAPP. I have no pride of opinion in the matter.

Mr. TELLER. I want the Senator's opinion that it is only confined to schools on the reservations and not intended to relate to those outside.

Mr. CLAPP. It was not intended to, and I do not think it could be so considered, so far as the words "governmental or other tribal purposes" are concerned. But I am perfectly willing to have language put in that will make it plainer, if the Senator will suggest it.

Mr. TELLER. With that understanding, I do not want to interfere with this wording.

Mr. OWEN. I move to strike out the words "governmental, school, or other."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 20, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out the words "governmental, school, or other," so that it will read:

The Secretary of the Interior shall take possession of all buildings now or heretofore used for tribal purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, before this amendment is agreed to I will say that that will very materially change this provision.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, and I think when it goes into operation the Senator from Oklahoma will very seriously regret having made the change. However, it affects his State more than any other, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. TELLER. Under the amendment which the Senator from Oklahoma proposes, if it should be agreed to, I think that the authority given later in this provision would enable the Secretary of the Interior to sell the property at Carlisle, Haskell, and other schools in several other sections of the country, which I do not believe we want to give him authority to do at this time.

Mr. OWEN. I simply made the suggestion to conform to the objection made that the language was too broad. It really being the purpose to confine it to the tribal property, I moved to strike out the other qualifying words, "thereby confining it to tribal property."

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest, Mr. President, if it would not meet every objection to simply strike out the word "governmental," so that it would read, "now or heretofore used for school or other tribal purposes."

Mr. OWEN. I ask the Senator from Minnesota if that would not include the Carlisle school?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly not. Even leaving in the word "governmental," reading "for governmental, school, or other tribal purposes," I think it would exclude every Federal school anyway, and if we strike out the word "governmental" that would absolutely exclude Federal schools.

Mr. OWEN. If we use the word "tribal purposes" would it not include the schools?

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir.

Mr. OWEN. Is not that a tribal purpose?

Mr. CLAPP. Does the Senator mean as to his State?

Mr. OWEN. I mean as to any State. If this is intended to apply to tribal purposes only, why not confine the language to tribal purposes?

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator from Oklahoma, whose State is most vitally interested in the passage of this provision, desires to strike out the word, for one I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. OWEN. I only want to ask the Senator what is the scope of the present language. If it includes some other buildings than tribal buildings I want to know what they are.

Mr. CLAPP. Under its present scope it would include anything—"governmental, school, or other tribal purposes."

Mr. OWEN. What are the things intended to be included?

Mr. CLAPP. I understand that the Creek Nation had a capitol building there which was used for tribal purposes.

Mr. OWEN. "Tribal purposes" would include that.

Mr. CLAPP. That would be included.

Mr. TELLER. Do you want to authorize the Secretary to sell that property?

Mr. OWEN. I have no objection to its being sold, if it is a part of the tribal property. I think it ought to be disposed of. But I think this clause ought to be limited in such way that the Secretary shall confine his operations with regard to these properties to the distinct contracts and agreements between the United States and the Five Civilized Tribes, or any other Indian tribes that may happen to be within the State of Oklahoma or any other State. I only suggest that because, if this language is intended to cover something else that does not clearly appear as under the term "tribal purposes," I want to know what it is?

Mr. TELLER. I do not know what is the intention of that provision. It is in the law now and has been——

Mr. CLAPP. It was first, so far as I recall, used with reference solely to the Indian Territory. I think it was in what is known as the "Five Civilized Tribes bill." It was section 15:

The Secretary of the Interior shall take possession of all buildings now or heretofore used for governmental, school, or other tribal purposes, together with the furniture therein and the land appertaining thereto.

Then that was amended afterwards by this proviso:

Provided, That this section shall not take effect until the date of the dissolution of the tribal governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes.

Now the Department asks—

To relieve this difficulty I respectfully ask that Senate bill No. 4644, to provide for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes, be amended by adding a paragraph, which shall read:

"SEC. 10. That section 15 of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes,' approved April 26, 1906, shall become operative immediately upon the approval of this act."

To avoid the circumlocution of going back and amending the old law, the committee inserted in the bill this provision, which will, of course, become operative upon the approval of the act.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to state to the Senate that when the Commisssioner was before the committee he suggested that this item was only intended to apply to tribal buildings located in that part of the country heretofore known as the "Indian Territory." But the committee thought it better to make it general.

Mr. TELLER. If that is so, it seems to me we ought specifically to limit it to that section. There is a very valuable school in Kansas. There are two very valuable schools in Colorado. I should not like to have them interfered with.

Mr. CURTIS. The Commissioner would not take charge of and sell the school in Kansas or the school in Pennsylvania so long as we continue to appropriate a year in advance and provide for the maintenance of the schools there; and so far as I am concerned, representing in part, as one of the Senators from that State, the great State of Kansas, I am not afraid of this provision applying to the Haskell School.

Mr. TELLER. I do not see any objection to this provision if it applies only to the schools on reservations, and I suggest that perhaps we had better put in, after "school," the words "on Indian reservations."

Mr. CLAPP. Does the Senator move that?

Mr. TELLER. I move that as an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado proposes an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "purposes," in line 21, page 3, insert "on Indian reservations."

Mr. TELLER. Let it come in after the word "school."

Mr. OWEN. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that the lands embraced in eastern Oklahoma, which formerly might have been called "reservations" are not reservations. They are a part of the State of Oklahoma, and they are owned by the citizens of the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. TELLER. That would not interfere with it at all?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; it would prevent the sale of those public buildings which are intended to be sold by this act, and to which I have no objection. I only wanted to narrow the language so that it would apply only to those buildings which have heretofore been used for tribal purposes.

Mr. TELLER. I am perfectly willing to accept any amendment to my amendment that the Senator from Oklahoma will propose which will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that if you add, after the word "buildings," in line 20, "in the eastern division of Oklahoma" the provision would then apply only to what was formerly the Indian Territory, and you could strike out the last part of line 11, and also line 12, on page 4. Then the item would apply only to buildings that are now located in that part of Oklahoma which formerly was in the Indian Territory.

Mr. OWEN. With the permission of the Senator from Colorado, I would suggest, therefore, the insertion, after the word "buildings," of an amendment to read:

On the lands formerly occupied by the late Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. CURTIS. Why put in the word "late?"

Mr. OWEN. Because they are dead.

Mr. CURTIS. The law says they are not.

Mr. OWEN. The law is mistaken if it says so.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not agree with the Senator from Oklahoma on that proposition.

Mr. OWEN. I am ready to debate that with the Senator from Kansas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of Senators to the fact that they must address the Chair before speaking.

Mr. CURTIS. I beg the Chair's pardon.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not believe Senators can improve any on this language—"used for governmental, school, or other tribal purposes." I have no objection to fixing it in any way Senators see fit.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not consider the school at Grand Junction, Colo., a governmental school?

Mr. CLAPP. Not in connection with the language "governmental, school, or other tribal purposes." It must relate to those schools that are associated with tribal governments.

Mr. TELLER. That might be the meaning, and yet somebody might think it meant something else.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado to use the words "on reservations," after "schools," or perhaps the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas to insert "in the eastern division of Oklahoma" would cover it beyond any question.

Mr. TELLER. Suppose you insert both?

Mr. CLAPP. Well.

Mr. GAMBLE. I suggest that an amendment be made in lines 11 and 12, page 4, by inserting:

And this provision shall apply solely to the property heretofore belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Then it would confine it to the property and the tribes for which the original amendment is proposed by the committee.

Mr. TELLER. It would be entirely satisfactory to me to make that amendment, and I withdraw my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to know what disposition was made of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Oklahoma restate his proposed amendment?

Mr. OWEN. After the word "buildings" insert:

On the lands heretofore belonging to the late Five Civilized Tribes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3 of the bill, line 20, after the word "buildings," it is proposed to insert:

On the lands heretofore belonging to the late Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I know nothing of the merits of the controversy here as to the late Five Civilized Tribes or whether the word is appropriate, but the Senator from Kansas, who is very familiar with the subject, states that the tribes are still recognized as in existence by law. If that is the case, of course such language as this would be contradictory and out of place. I should like to have that point settled before we are called upon to vote on the amendment.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I decline to leave out the word "late," and I am prepared to defend my amendment before the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "late."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas proposes an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the words "Five Civilized Tribes" it is proposed to strike out the word "late."

Mr. OWEN obtained the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not know whether it is the purpose of the Senator from Oklahoma to enter at length upon a discussion of the legal status of those tribes. I want to state to him—it may be entirely unnecessary—that at 2 o'clock the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] will take the floor, and the bill will be laid aside at that time.

Mr. OWEN. There is an abundance of time, I take it, to consider this question. It is an important question. It is an important question to me. Am I, a Senator of the United States, a member of a living Indian tribe, and under the supervisory control of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. CURTIS. Your property is under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, and you know it.

Mr. OWEN. I deny it.

Mr. CURTIS. Well, it is. The Supreme Court has so decided.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Kansas says that my property is under the control of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not desire to make it that broad.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. With great pleasure.

Mr. CURTIS. I mean the property you own as a member or as a former member—if you want to put it that way, I say now as a member—of the Cherokee tribe of Indians. The Secretary of the Interior has no interest in your property that you hold other than as a member of the Cherokee tribe, but as to the land you own as a member of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, under existing law, you are still under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. I think you ought not to be, but you are.

Mr. OWEN. I agree with the Senator from Kansas that I ought not to be. I disagree with him in his proposition that I am.

Mr. President, it is true that I was an adopted member of the late Cherokee tribe of Indians; that I was a member of that tribe by blood. It is also true that by the act of March 3, 1901—an act which I had the honor to write—every Indian in the Indian Territory was made a citizen of the United States, with all the rights, with all the privileges, with all of the immunities of any other citizen of the United States; not some of the rights, not some of the privileges, and not some of the immunities; and one of the rights of a citizen of the United States is that he shall have the free right of contract. That right did not depart from me merely because the Cherokee Nation, under an agreement with the United States, conveyed to me a so-called "allotment."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. CURTIS. Did not the Senator from Oklahoma participate in the campaign that approved the agreement between the Cherokee Nation and the United States, and did not that——

Mr. OWEN. He might have done so, but did not.

Mr. CURTIS. And did not that agreement which your people adopted provide that the restrictions should be retained on your homestead for twenty-one years and should be retained on the surplus lands until five years after the date of the patent?

Mr. OWEN. I am quite content that the Senator from Kansas brings to the attention of the Senate this so-called agreement. It was an act of Congress which was passed on July 1, 1902. The act required the approval of the citizens of the United States, who at that time had certain property rights under the term "Cherokee Nation." They were no longer Indians. The Supreme Court of the United States has passed upon this question in the most elaborate review in the so-called "Albert Heff case."

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I will not yield to further interruptions at this time.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. OWEN. I decline to yield to further questions at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma declines to yield.

Mr. OWEN. I will yield to the Senator from Kansas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma yields to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no question to ask the gentleman.

Mr. OWEN. By the act of July 1, 1902, these so-called "Cherokee Indians," who were then and there citizens of the United States holding certain property rights, it is true, agreed by their act confirming the act of Congress to the distribution of this property, making the United States the trustee for the distribution, and by that act it was expressly stipulated that the tribe itself should be made up as of the 1st of September, 1902. The property was to be distributed as of that date. The Cherokee Nation as of that date and now has no legislature. The Cherokee Nation has no executive department. The Cherokee Nation has no judiciary department. It has no function of government. Its laws can not be enforced in any forum. But nevertheless thereafter this so-called "government" was attempted to be revived by an act of Congress of March 3, 1906, by which the tribal government was nominally continued, there being no tribal government.

The phraseology which has been in use in the Department of the Interior for all these years when a tribe ceased to have a governmental function was "late tribe." They speak of the "late Delaware Indians." As United States Indian agent years and years ago, I used to make payments to the "late Delaware tribe," using that term to describe a community of people which still had tribal property, but which had no governmental function, and which had no life as a government. And therefore I say that while the law nominally continues these tribes, the true designation of the tribes is the "late Five Civilized Tribes," because they are no longer governments. They serve no longer a use. I think that this matter ought to be correctly written in our law. It ought not to appear here that the Five Civilized Tribes are really governments when in point of fact they do not exist as governments.

I do not introduce the word "late" in any arbitrary spirit. I do it because there is a vital distinction between a living governmental organism and a tribe which is dead and which is only used as a designation to describe a community of people who have certain undistributed property rights.

The United States was made trustee for the distribution of this property. It has now allotted nearly all of these lands. The allotments are almost complete. And why shall we go on with this fiction, speaking of this tribe as if it was a living governmental organism and as if it might afford protection to its citizens and demand allegiance from them? The Cherokee Nation can demand no allegiance from me. I owe the Cherokee Nation as a government no allegiance. The only allegiance on earth that I owe is to the Government of the United States and to the State of Oklahoma. I want this distinction clearly kept in mind, and I appeal to the Senate that my suggestion with reference to the word "late" is justified by precedents, is justified by good principles of law, and ought to be included in this language.

I do not want to take up the time of the Senate uselessly in discussing this matter. I say the Supreme Court has passed upon it. If it is necessary to show those decisions of the Supreme Court, I am prepared to do it. I do not want to take up the time with regard to it, but I shall insist that this is right—that the word "late" should be included.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desired to interrupt the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] so that he might be able to make a correct statement to the Senate as to the position of the Five Civilized Tribes and that he might distinguish between the decision of the Supreme Court in the Heff case and other decisions; but he did not care to yield for the question. The distinguished Senator says that as an agent he paid the Delawares as "late" Delawares. Why not tell the Senate how it happened? When he made that payment to the Delawares they had been swallowed up by the Cherokee tribe, of which he is a member, and so far as the Delawares were concerned they were out of business and were then a part of the Cherokee tribe. That is why he paid them as the "late" Delaware Indians.

The distinguished Senator from Oklahoma is too good a lawyer to claim for one minute that the Heff case affected in any degree the property rights of the Indian. I have here a decision in the case of McKay v. Agnes Kalyton, by Louis Kalyton, her guardian, reported in 204 United States Supreme Court, in which the court holds that the Government of the United States continues to control the lands of the Indians until the expiration of the trust period, just as I claim it controls the lands of the Indians in that part of Oklahoma formerly the Indian Territory, until the restrictions are removed, or until the expiration of the restriction period, and Congress has full control over their property until that time. The Supreme Court so holds in this case, and it refers to the decision in the Rickert case with approval. Here is what they say about the Heff case, and if the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma has not read it, I submit it to him for his careful consideration:

> Nor are the principles which were thus announced as to the nature and character of an allotment of Indian lands and the interest of the United States therein as trustee before the expiration of the period for their final disposition in any way affected by the decision in the matter of Heff (197 U. S., 488), dealing with the subjection of allottee Indians in their personal conduct to the police regulations of the State of which they had become citizens.

That is what the Supreme Court decided in that case.

The Heff case applied only to the person and to the police regulations of the State and not to the property of the Indians.

It is true that Congress fixed a time for the expiration of the tribal governments in Oklahoma—the Five Civilized Tribes. But before that time arrived Congress, as it had a right to do, passed a joint resolution extending the life of the Five Civilized Tribes, and the Five Civilized Tribes are still in existence. They have their chiefs. They have their councils. Those chiefs must sign the patents or deeds to the land allotted to the members of the tribe. It was extended by a joint resolution, and so far as concerns the lands owned by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma which he derived from the Cherokee Nation, they are still under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, unless he has had the restrictions removed. Under the law he has a right to file an application to have those restrictions removed, and there is a law, which has not been decided unconstitutional, prohibiting the full bloods of the very tribe to which the distinguished Senator belongs from selling their lands for twenty-five years.

The Government still has control of those lands, and I think it would be a very serious mistake for the Senate to say that the joint resolution it passed on the 2d of March amounted to nothing by declaring that the Five Civilized Tribes are "late" tribes. The joint resolution to which I call the attention of the Senate is as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the tribal existence and present tribal governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes or nations of Indians in the Indian Territory are hereby continued in full force and effect for all purposes under existing laws until all property of such tribes, or the proceeds thereof, shall be distributed among the individual members of said tribes unless hereafter otherwise provided by law.

That is the law of the land to-day, and it applies to the Five Civilized Tribes, and the Five Civilized Tribes are in existence as much to-day as they ever were, except the acts of their legislature must be approved by the President.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, as I may have seemed somewhat discourteous to the Senator from Kansas in not yielding promptly to a question when I wanted to make an argument a while ago, I took some pains not to interrupt him and now express my sincere regret at any apparent lack of consideration.

The Senator from Kansas lays great stress upon the reason for the use of the term "late Delaware tribe," because they were absorbed by the Cherokee Nation. Quite right; the argument is sound, and applies with equal force to the Cherokee Nation, whose citizenship has been absorbed by Oklahoma absolutely.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. I will yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Not absorbed in the same way. The lands have not been absorbed. The Delawares, when they bought into the Cherokee Nation, bought simply the right to participate as members of the tribe.

Mr. OWEN. And the Cherokee people, when they became citizens of Oklahoma, owed their allegiance to Oklahoma. Oklahoma has control of their property, of their lives, and may take their lives under the law of Oklahoma. Oklahoma is the sovereign over the Cherokee individuals who formerly were Cherokee citizens, but who are now citizens of Oklahoma.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. The distinguished Senator will admit that Oklahoma has no right to tax the lands of the civilized tribes that were exempt by the agreements with them.

Mr. OWEN. I emphatically deny the proposition.

Mr. CURTIS. The Supreme Court decided that very point in the Rickerts case; that is, that States had no right to tax property during the restriction period.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, there is a distinction between the citizens of the five tribes and the citizens of Indian blood in Kansas, and I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to that distinction. The distinction is this: When the Kickapoos of Kansas were allotted they were aliens, they were not citizens of Kansas. The United States dealt with them as aliens and as wards, and the United States did have a supervisory control of them.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. Does not the Senator from Oklahoma know that under the very act by which they were allotted a man who had become a citizen of the United States might be allotted? Does not the Senator know that the very act that he secured the amendment to, the act of 1887, provided that if a man left the reservation and became a citizen of the United States he did not lose his right to the tribal property?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; but that does not affect the argument. The argument which I make is that while United States citizens may be given these privileges, the decision of the court to which the Senator appeals goes to the individual who was an alien and who received his citizenship after he had received a grant of land with that condition attached to it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I was in sympathy with the declaration of the Senator from Oklahoma to the effect that he did not consider himself under the control of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. OWEN. I said it very deferentially.

Mr. CARTER. Such control would have been more odious in former days than at present, but it is intolerable at any time in so far as the Senator is concerned.

I desire now to point out to the Senator from Oklahoma and likewise to the Senator from Kansas what I conceive to be a clear misunderstanding, both being right, but not understanding each other. That apparently paradoxical condition seems to me to present the case fully.

The Senator from Oklahoma says that by virtue of certain acts of Congress the members of the Five Civilized Tribes became full and unquestionable citizens of the United States and are such now. That is a personal status, and with that status the Senator from Kansas does not take issue at all.

On the other hand, I think the Senator from Oklahoma will admit that in so far as the members of the Five Civilized Tribes received property, which had theretofore been held in common, they received the realty subject to conditions, and the conditions run with the title and do not affect the citizenship of the individual owning the land except to the extent of the limitation upon his action with reference to particular property.

Now, is the case different from this? A lot of land may be purchased by a citizen in the District of Columbia, the original owner fixing to the title of that property a restriction to the effect that intoxicating liquors shall never be sold upon the premises. That restriction does apply to certain lands in the District of Columbia to-day. The purchaser of a lot of land subject to that restriction does not lose his citizenship of the United States, but he buys the land subject to the restriction attached to the title. I ask the Senator if that is not the case with reference to citizenship and former tribal property in Oklahoma in so far as these tribes are concerned?

Mr. OWEN. It is not.

Mr. CARTER. I shall be glad to have the Senator point out the difference.

Mr. OWEN. I shall explain it to the Senator. I thank him for the effort to elucidate the differences between the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Oklahoma. His intention was good, and what he says applies with force and is right in other cases than the one which I am now about to present.

The difference is that when this agreement in 1902 was made between the so-called "Cherokee tribe" and the United States it was not made, in fact, with a lot of Indians nor with an Indian government; it was made with a certain number of United States citizens, armed with all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizenship. They were citizens of the United States. I wish particularly to exclude the idea of Indian when you consider this matter, because there is no Indian within the meaning of the law in the limits of the Five Civilized Tribes. An Indian, under the law, means a ward. An Indian means a subordinate under the law. It means an alien under the law. Am I an alien?

I will discuss the Senator's question, Mr. President. I will not forget the distinction he makes, and I will answer it. But now I call your attention to the fact that there was no Indian within the limits of the Five Civilized Tribes when this contract between the United States and the Five Civilized Tribes was made.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. You admit, do you not, that there was a tribe of Cherokees there?

Mr. OWEN. No; I admit nothing of the kind.

Mr. CURTIS. You admit, do you not, that they had property—money and land?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly I do.

Mr. CURTIS. Who had the money and land if the tribe did not have it?

Mr. OWEN. There was no tribe. They were United States citizens and were not a tribe.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, were they not known as a tribe?

Mr. OWEN. It is that error of designation I am trying now to correct.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to his colleague?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. GORE. I merely desire to suggest it might be well for the Senate to recognize the belligerent rights of these two Indians. [Laughter.]

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I was not an alien in the year of our Lord 1902. I was a full citizen of the United States, and I had no more rights as a citizen of the United States than did any other man who belonged to the so-called and pretended tribe of Cherokee Indians. There was no tribe and there was no Indian within the meaning of the law, because an Indian is an alien.

Mr. CURTIS. That can not be so, Mr. President.

Mr. OWEN. It is so, and the Senator from Kansas can never deny a truth so patent.

Mr. CURTIS. The Supreme Court say——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. CURTIS. The act of 1887 recognizes that an Indian may become a citizen of the United States and enjoy all the rights and privileges and still be a member of his tribe.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; in the Albert Heff case John Butler was a Kickapoo Indian and a member of his tribe, and the United States undertook to assume jurisdiction over his appetite for liquor while the State of Kansas had jurisdiction over his person otherwise; and the interesting distinction was brought about that it was necessary and essential in order to have both jurisdictions to vest, that the aforesaid John Butler should be separated for the purposes of the State courts as to his person from the aforesaid appetite for intoxicating liquor for Federal purposes—[laughter]—a distinction which shows the absurdity of the contention of the Senator from Kansas. John Butler was subject to the laws in Kansas; he owed allegiance to the laws of Kansas which had jurisdiction over his life and over his property; and the only benefit of keeping John Butler a member of the Kickapoo tribe is to pay the salary of the Indian agent, who is a holder of office.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. You do not have to yield.

Mr. OWEN. I will yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma referred to the Heff case. He knows that was applied to the police powers of the State. He knows also that the Supreme Court has decided that the allottee, who may become a citizen of the United States by that allotment and enjoy all the rights and privileges, still holds his land as a member of the tribe, subject to the restrictions placed thereon by the act giving him the land. I have not contended that Congress was trying to exercise any right over the individual, but that Congress has the right to control his property until the restrictions are removed.

Mr. OWEN. I am sure that the Senator from Kansas, Mr. President, believes that Congress has the right to control my property, but the Senator from Kansas is mistaken with regard to it, because if I have the right of contract I can give away my property.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the distinction. I agree with the Senator from Kansas that when I receive a limited title forbidding me by act of the grantor to divest myself of the legal fee for five years, the legal fee will remain vested in me for five years; but what I call your attention to now is the vital distinction in this case. If I am a free man, if I am a citizen of the United States, with all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizenship, I can dispose of my equity and I can give my bond for title, and there is no power in the Federal Government to stop it.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3023.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, the last panic, with its disastrous consequences, depreciated values, stoppage of industrial and commercial development, and enforced idleness, came suddenly and at a time when people were prosperous and when the Government in its resources, the banks in their affairs, and business in its activities never seemed sounder and stronger. Some persons say we faced a crisis unequaled in our history, and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. ALDRICH], who reported the bill now under consideration, said:

> The financial crisis from which the country has just emerged, which terminated in a serious panic in October, was the most acute and destructive in its consequences of any which has occurred in the history of the country.

There has never been a monetary system in our country which was entirely free from financial disturbances. There were financial panics in 1837 and in 1857 and in 1873 and in 1893, but the conditions at the time each of these panics occurred were entirely different from the conditions which preceded the late panic.

The amount of money in actual circulation in our country is greater per capita than in any other commercial country in the world, except France, where business conditions are very different from ours and where business is done largely upon bank notes instead of upon bank credits, as in our country. In 1907, just previous to the commencement of the panic, the amount of money in circulation in the United States outside of the Treasury was $2,805,854,374, or $34 per capita, being the largest amount per capita up to that time in the history of our country, and nearly double what it was in 1896. We have twice as much money per capita as Great Britain, seven times as much as Japan, four times as much as Russia, and $7 per capita more than Germany. Six thousand six hundred national banks held $1,106,500,000, and 11,000 State banks and trust companies held a large part of the remainder. Deposits in our national banks, State banks, savings banks, and trust companies had increased, in round numbers, from five billions to thirteen billions. I might also state, to show the remarkable condition of the crops of the country, that in 1907 there were 13,500,000 bales of cotton produced, which sold at an average of 12 cents per pound, being the largest number of bales ever produced in the Southern States in one year, and there were produced in the United States 735,000,000 bushels of wheat, and all other farm products were produced in 1907 in the same abundance; and when the panic broke upon the country we were enjoying unrivaled prosperity, and all the products of the fields, factories, and mines were selling for the highest prices they had commanded in many years.

THE PANIC.

The wonder of the times, therefore, is, What produced the panic? I should say the panic was produced by overtrading, unbounded speculation, unlimited gambling in stocks, hazardous business enterprises, combinations and consolidations that enriched the promoters and impoverished the people and destroyed public confidence, and caused money to be hoarded, and made depositors withhold money and withdraw money from the banks because afraid of the banks, and made banks withhold money and refuse to pay it out because afraid of depositors, and because, in many instances, their part of the reserves had been sent to eastern cities and were not available.

There were never in the history of our country more heroic efforts made to avert or lighten the disastrous effects of a panic than were made in the last three months of the year 1907.

The Secretary of the Treasury deposited in banks of New York, and other banks, $70,000,000. Clearing-house certificates were issued to about $190,000,000, pay checks were issued by banks and individuals amounting to $75,000,000, enlargement of bank-note circulation took place amounting to $94,000,000, importations of gold, resulting in an enlarged issue of gold certificates amounting to $66,000,000, making an increase in the amount of currency and substitutes for currency amounting to nearly $500,000,000. This increase of currency and prompt and courageous action of New York bankers in helping banks that were assailed stopped the panic and saved the country from a serious and ruinous crisis.

DUTY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. President, I believe it is the imperative duty of Congress to provide some means of avoiding or meeting successfully another financial panic. There are still traces of the panic of 1907. While general conditions have improved and hoarded money is again in the usual channels, there is still anxiety and disquiet in financial and industrial circles, and prompt and satisfactory action by Congress will be of immense benefit in every part of our country.

I do not believe we should at present undertake to revise the whole monetary system of the United States. This is the worst possible time to undertake such a task. Our financial system should be reformed when everything is normal and satisfactory, and not when we have just emerged from the dangers of a financial revolution. Any very radical change at this time might bring serious injury. In the future and at another session of Congress, when times are propitious, I believe there should be a revision of our entire monetary system.

I am not in favor of the proposition advocated by some persons to establish a great central bank of issue, such as they have in England, France, and Germany. Neither am I in favor of the bill presented by the American Bankers' Association or of the bill known as the "Fowler bill." This bill in its entirety provides for the early retirement of all bond-secured currency and, at a later period, for the retirement of all Treasury notes, and in their stead would provide, under certain restrictions, for the issue of "national-bank guaranteed credit notes" through the respective national banks up to the amount of their paid-in capital, and for further issue, if recommended by the board of managers of the respective redemption districts. While there are other objections to this bill, it is such a complete revision of our monetary system that it is objectionable at this time. I shall not, however, consume time by attempting to discuss these financial measures.

FIVE HUNDRED MILLIONS OF DOLLARS OF UNITED STATES NOTES.

The expedient resorted to by the Secretary of the Treasury, by financial institutions, and by individuals to increase the volume of currency in the panic of 1907 furnishes a good object lesson and suggests legislation to authorize additional notes to be used in emergencies. I believe that the authorized issue should be in United States notes instead of national-bank notes. According to my old-fashioned Democratic belief, it is the constitutional function of the Government of the United States to issue money to be used by the people. We depend upon the Government and not upon the banks to uphold our currency, and the bank note has its present value because the United States is behind it. Therefor in emergencies United States notes and not bank notes should be provided. Albert Gallatin, who was Secretary of the Treasury for two terms under Jefferson and also under Madison, said:

> The right of issuing paper money as currency, like that of issuing gold and silver coins, belongs exclusively to the nation, and can not be claimed by any individual.

Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson upheld the doctrine that our money should be gold and silver and paper money, issued by the Government.

To express my views more at length, I am in favor of a bond-secured emergency currency with an interest charge sufficiently high to compel contraction of such issue after the emergency has passed. I believe that whenever, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, business conditions require it, he should deposit in national banks and in State banks and savings banks $500,000,000, or so much thereof as may be deemed necessary and proper, the deposits to be apportioned among the several States in accordance with their population, and the Treasurer of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may accept as security for the deposits United States bonds, State bonds, county or municipal bonds, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $500,000,000, and these notes shall possess all the legal qualities and be uniform in all respects with United States notes now outstanding, and each bank receiving deposits shall pay interest monthly at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent per month for the first six months, and at the rate of three-fourths of 1 per cent thereafter, as set forth in the substitute offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] for the bill now under consideration.

There are now in circulation $350,000,000 of Treasury notes not costing the Government anything and performing all the functions of money, and these could be added to the $500,000,000 emergency currency without in any way disturbing our monetary system.

If use is made of the Treasury for the solution of the currency question, it may be again asserted, as it has already been asserted, that the Government will be put into the banking business. The Government is already heavily in the banking business. It is the custodian of coin and bullion against which it has issued its warehouse receipts for both gold and silver, and which are known as "certificates." It also has outstanding notes, those of 1890, for purchase of silver bullion, and also the greenbacks, against which the reserve fund of $150,000,000 was provided as an earnest of the intention to redeem them in gold upon demand. It therefore is in the position of being a depository with notes outstanding. It is also a large lender of money. This is shown by the $245,000,000 deposited with the national banks throughout the country subject to call, and these deposits are nothing more nor less than loans to the banks.

Mr. President, I have shown what I am in favor of as regards furnishing an emergency currency. The bill under consideration, reported by the majority of the Committee on Finance, seeks to provide a currency to meet an emergency like that which lately occurred. I have great respect for the Senators who compose that committee, and, while I agree with the minority of the committee, I can not say that the bill, as reported by the majority of the committee, if enacted into law, would be valueless in time of financial depression, or that it would fail to accomplish at least a part of the results for which the chairman so forcibly contended. This bill provides for a possible issue in emergencies of five hundred millions of national-bank notes redeemable by the United States in lawful money upon presentation at the Treasury.

They are to be issued to any applying association if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, business conditions in the particular locality of the bank demand additional circulation, and for the security of the Government the banks are required to deposit in the Treasury State bonds, county bonds, municipal bonds, or first-mortgage bonds of any railroad company which has paid dividends of not less than 4 per cent per annum regularly for a period of not less than five years previous to the deposit of the bonds. Some of the important objections to the bill are that it relinquishes the sovereign right of the United States Government to issue and circulate money.

It greatly enlarges the power of national banks, which, already, under existing law, have the power to take out additional circulation in the form of national-bank notes to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars. It discriminates against United States bonds, and they are not permitted to be used as a basis for emergency currency notes, while this privilege is given to railroad bonds. I do not believe that railroad bonds should have this public function, but that United States bonds should have it, and other bonds provided for as already referred to by me.

The requirement as to railroad bonds, mentioned in the Aldrich bill, that the railroad issuing them must have paid dividends of not less than 4 per cent per annum regularly and continuously on its entire capital stock for a period of not less than five years previous to the deposit of the bonds, discriminates in favor of the railroads of the East. I know of no railroads in the South that pay dividends as provided in this bill. There may be such roads, but I have seen no report that indicates such railroads.

Besides, the Secretary of the Treasury would have great difficulty in determining the value of railroad bonds. Their value often fluctuates. The value of nearly all railroad bonds has been reduced in the last few months.

Another strong point in opposition to national-bank currency being used as emergency currency is national-bank currency can not be successfully employed as emergency currency because it can not be ordered, printed, signed, and placed in circulation rapidly enough to check or prevent a panic. Panics develop rapidly and quick and decisive action at the beginning of the financial disturbance is absolutely demanded. The Government currency is the best emergency currency, and it should be printed and stored in large quantities ready to be issued when Government bonds, State, county, or municipal bonds are presented according to law. This kind of currency will help to restore confidence, and I may say in this connection that clearing-house certificates and pay checks issued during the recent panic were viewed as signals of distress, and they disturbed confidence and increased the alarm and caused lawful money to be withdrawn from circulation.

The bill under consideration has aroused opposition in various financial circles. A joint meeting of the council of administration of the American Bankers' Association and the legislative committee of that body, held at the Union League Club, New York City, January 27, 1908, put the organization on record as disapproving the provisions of the Aldrich financial bill, and this is the resolution which was concurred in by the chairmen of the individual groups of the association in every county of the State:

Resolved, That the bankers of the State of New York unequivocally disapprove of the provisions of the Aldrich bill; that they do not approve of a bond-secured emergency currency; that they demand an elastic currency based on bank assets, as provided in the measure of the currency commission of the American Bankers' Association.

The committee on bankruptcy and commercial law of the Merchants' Association of New York made a report against the bill to amend the national banking laws introduced by Senator Aldrich, and among the resolutions approved by unanimous vote of the board of directors is the following:

The high tax which this bill proposes to levy upon the issue of emergency currency, and which, in the last analysis, would be paid by the borrower to the banks, when increased, as it would be in practice, at least one-third by reserve requirements, is not only unnecessary but oppressive; and in this and other States would provoke an immediate disregard of the statutes against usury. It is not becoming that a great nation should fill its coffers from the necessities of borrowers; and it is manifestly improper to pass one law which offers inducements to the violation of another.

The committee further declared that—

It is the unanimous opinion of your committee, as evidenced by the signatures hereto, that rather than accept legislation of the character of the Aldrich bill, which we feel in its ultimate results will be most disastrous to the commercial interests of the country, it would be preferable to have no legislation at all, in spite of the manifest necessity of some relief of the present intolerable situation.

The Trades' League of Philadelphia adopted February 13, 1908, resolutions reported by a special committee on banking and currency, as follows:

Resolved, That the Trades' League of Philadelphia is unalterably opposed to the passage of the Aldrich currency bill, for the reason that it provides for additional bond-secured currency based on a deposit of State, municipal, and railroad bonds, which the country banks do not generally possess, and imposing a rate of interest which few commercial banks can afford to pay, thereby creating a fictitious value for certain bonds, favoring special financial interests, and ignoring the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial needs of the country.

NATIONAL BANKS.

My desire to have United States notes instead of national-bank notes for emergency currency is not prompted by prejudice against national banks. The plan I am advocating makes national banks important factors in the emergency currency problem, for it authorizes national banks to obtain United States notes by depositing in the United States Treasury proper collateral.

I have no sympathy with those who try to discredit national banks. Neither do I indorse the statement made by some persons that the national banking system was conceived and established by Secretary of the Treasury Chase simply to raise money by the sale of United States bonds during the civil war. Any person who will study the origin and history of national banks will be convinced that while Secretary Chase desired to raise money by the sale of United States bonds, his first object was to have a safe, sound, and uniform currency that would circulate at par, not only during the war, but also in time of peace in all sections of the country; and the fact that national banks have lasted forty-five years, through Democratic as well as Republican administrations, proves that the plan he formulated has given reasonable satisfaction. If the national-bank system had not been reasonably satisfactory one party or the other would have tried to repeal it.

There are now nearly 7,000 national banks in the United States with a capital of about $800,000,000 and deposits of thirteen hundred millions of dollars. This system has helped to maintain sound money and unquestioned credit at home and abroad.

When the act of March 14, 1900, authorizing the conversion of 3 per cent, 4 per cent, and 5 per cent bonds into 2 per cent consols, of which there have been issued $595,000,000 worth, there was doubt and apprehension on the part of financiers, Congressmen, and Government officials as to the ability of the Government to sell at par bonds bearing a rate of interest so low as 2 per cent, and the financial world was surprised when these bonds were sold at a premium, and I know of no other nation that maintains so low a rate of interest on its securities as this. The magnificent result to which I have referred could not have been attained if it had not been for the generous support of the national banks, and they have been of great benefit to the borrowers in reducing the rate of interest on loans and in reducing annual interest charges of the Government. In 1864 the annual interest charge of the Government amounted, in round numbers, to $53,000,000, while in 1907 it was but $24,000,000. This reduction, of necessity, greatly aided the United States Government in placing its securities on more favorable terms than any other nation. A conspicuous instance occurred but recently, when Secretary Cortelyou sold United States 2 per cent Panama bonds at 104, while New York City 6 per cent bonds sold at only 104 and a fraction.

BANK RESERVES.

In providing a remedy for future panics, I believe we should also strive to eradicate, as far as possible, the cause or causes which helped to produce the late financial disturbance or panic. I believe that one of the most important causes of the late panic was that too small a percentage of the legal bank reserves were held in the banks to which the reserves belonged. The national-bank act provides that the banks in the small cities and towns shall retain 15 per cent of their deposits as a reserve, and the larger banks in the larger cities, known as "reserve cities," are required to keep 25 per cent of their deposits as a reserve. The act also provides that a bank not in a reserve city may deposit three-fifths of its lawful reserve in a bank in a reserve center, retaining only two-fifths in its own vault.

To state it in another way, a bank in one city can not loan its lawful reserve to its customers in that city, but it can deposit three-fifths of it in a bank in New York City and get interest on it at 2 or 3 per cent. In the spring and summer of last year, when there was no special demand for money in the South, the banks in that section of the country sent a large part of their reserves to the reserve banks in New York City, because they could get interest, and when the time came to move the crops in the fall, when money was needed and the New York bankers could not respond and arbitrarily refused to pay currency to their customers, and three-fifths of the reserves of banks were locked up or not obtainable, the people became alarmed and withdrew their deposits as fast as possible, and hundreds of millions of dollars were hoarded and taken out of circulation when most needed in the channels of business and trade, and this system of country banks depositing most of their reserves in New York City and other cities where there are central reserve banks greatly helped to precipitate the recent panic. The reserve banks had with their reserve agents, the central reserve banks, August 22, 1907, $194,000,000 of their legal reserve and the country banks had with their reserve agents, the reserve and central reserve banks, $420,000,000 of their legal reserve, aggregating $614,000,000, and the national banks of New York City at that time held $213,000,000 of the reserve of other banks, and it has been stated that when during the panic urgent demands were made by the country banks for their reserve the New York City banks sent only $10,820,511, or about 5 per cent, in liquidation of their reserve indebtedness.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon a question?

Mr. McCREARY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. It is not asked in any spirit of criticism, but for the purpose of information. Can the Senator state what proportion of the money held by the New York banks, say on the 1st of October, consisted of or was within the limit of the reserve loans deposited there?

Mr. McCREARY. I have stated that, but I will refer to it again.

Mr. CLAPP. Not the amount of reserves, but what proportion they bore to the total amount that the outside banks had on deposit in New York at that time.

Mr. McCREARY. The national banks of New York City at that time held $213,000,000 of reserve of other banks.

If this reserve money, or the greater part of it, had been kept at home in the vaults of the banks in which it belonged there would have been millions of ready cash available, and country banks would not have been forced to pay only small amounts across their counters and deny to their customers money to move the crops, for reserves are held not only as a guaranty of solvency, but in emergencies and times of stress I doubt not that reserves may, at least in part, be used to pay depositors.

I regret that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] eliminated from his original bill the provision requiring national banks to hold at least three-fifths of their reserve in their own vaults. This was a wise and, I think, much-needed provision. I shall vote for the amendment now pending to require national banks to keep in their own vaults at least two-thirds of the reserve which the law now requires them to hold, and in no case allow them to keep more than one-third of such reserve with their reserve agent or agents.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BOURNE in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCREARY. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if his idea is to have the banks outside of reserve cities carry two-thirds or 10 per cent of their reserves in their vaults in lawful money of the United States

Mr. McCREARY. I thought I had answered that question very clearly.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the position that the Senator takes?

Mr. McCREARY. I am in favor of an amendment which is now pending to require national banks to keep in their vaults at least two-thirds of the reserve that the law now requires them to hold, in no case allowing them to keep more than one-third of such reserve with their reserve agent or agents.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that to be the position the Senator has taken, but is he not aware of the fact that if that is required it will lock up a great deal of money that is now in circulation? And not only would it lock it up, but there is not money enough to comply with such a law.

Mr. McCREARY. I believe that the amount of what we call "reserve" sent to New York and other places when not needed, and which could not be obtained by the banks when it was needed for moving the crops, helped very much to bring on the panic.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe, Mr. President, that that is correct, so far as that is concerned; but I believe if the Senator studies carefully the provision he now speaks of he will see that it would be impossible to enforce it with the amount of money we have in circulation to-day. I am in full sympathy with the Senator in seeking to require a greater deposit in the banks outside of reserve cities, and I should like to see 20 per cent instead of 15 per cent required; but I do believe the proper way to do that is to require them to keep the bonds as provided in this bill instead of tying up the money in their safes and thereby withdrawing it from business and circulation.

Mr. McCREARY. I do not believe the existing law requires the national banks to keep in their vaults a sufficient amount of their reserve. Therefore, as I said before, I am in favor of an amendment requiring the national banks to keep in their own vaults at least two-thirds of the reserve which the law now requires them to hold, in no case allowing them to keep more than one-third of such reserve with their reserve agent or agents.

INTEREST ON DEPOSITS.

Mr. President, I am in favor of amending the national banking laws so as to require the Secretary of the Treasury, in distributing the deposits of public money in national-bank depositories, to make the distribution according to population as shown by the last census, and I am in favor also of requiring the banks receiving such deposits to pay to the Government of the United States interest on the deposits at a rate not less than 2 per cent per annum nor more than 4 per cent per annum.

The act of March 4, 1907, required the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute all public money as equitably as possible among the different States and sections of the United States. The distribution does not appear to have been made as equitably and impartially as might have been, the eastern banks, and particularly banks in New York, receiving considerably more than they were entitled to. The strain on the southern and western banks would have been much less severe during the last financial disturbance if the deposits had been equitably and fairly distributed, as required by law. I have read the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency and the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury to criticisms and demands for information made in this Chamber, and I believe the attention which has been given by the Senate to this subject will be in the interest of an equitable distribution of the public deposits in the future. If the public money is not equitably distributed, the law should be so amended as to compel an equitable distribution of the public deposits among the different States.

In many of the States banks receiving deposits of State money pay interest on the amount deposited. The same rule should apply when the United States Government deposits Government money. There are $245,000,000 of public money now in these depositories without interest, and banks receiving money loan it to the people for a good rate of interest, usually 6 per cent. In this way they make a large profit. The deposits, of course, are subject to the call of the Treasury Department, but so is a large part of the money deposited by private customers. These depositories are also fiscal agents of the Government, and the distribution helps them in business and makes such banks more conspicuous. They should be required to pay at least 2 per cent on the public money deposited.

Mr. President, I regret as much as any person the panic which has now gone into history as the panic of 1907, and I am ready to do all in my power to prevent or guard against another panic. Experience in the last crisis shows necessity for wise and remedial legislation by Congress. It has been well said—

Our country has a banking power and wealth of resources and a volume of commercial industry equal to all the commercial world besides.

We should strive to advance all the interests of our country and lift it to a higher eminence than it has ever occupied before.

TRACK CONNECTION WITH THE WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I ask for the present consideration of Senate bill 3976.

Mr. CLAPP. Just one moment, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the bill now under consideration ought to be temporarily laid aside, and I make that request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered. The bill for which the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] asks consideration will now be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3976) to authorize and require the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company to maintain and operate a track connection with the United States navy-yard in the city of Washington, D. C.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, there is a motion pending to reconsider the vote by which that bill was passed. I now move that the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, this bill is a substitute for a bill introduced at the request of the Secretary of the Navy. The original bill extended for two years the time for the removal of the tracks from certain streets in the vicinity of the Washington Navy-Yard. Under existing law the removal of those tracks is required on the 28th day of this month. Unless the time is extended or some other means provided before such removal, the navy-yard will be left without any track connection. The Committee on the District of Columbia deemed it unwise merely to extend the time for continuing the surface tracks on the streets, without at the same time providing for the construction of some permanent connection between the railroad and the navy-yard. The bill as passed made such provision. It arbitrarily required the railroad company to build a connection along the Anacostia River between its main line and the navy-yard.

After the passage of the bill we were advised by the Secretary of the Navy that the railroad company would not undertake to construct that proposed connection in conformity with the terms of the bill. Hence, the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed. We have since made certain amendments, which, if added, will probably result in the construction along the river front of the track to connect permanently with the navy-yard. I now offer the amendments, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 2, line 12, after the word "southwestwardly," it is proposed to insert "across square south 1067;" so as to read:

That the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to construct a single branch track or siding from its present main line, at some point, to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, between the bridge over the Anacostia River at Pennsylvania avenue SE., and 1,000 feet westerly therefrom; thence extending by curve in a southwestwardly direction across square south of 1080, to Fifteenth street east; thence southwestwardly across square south 1067 on a line generally parallel to the center line of Water street, at such distance between the center line of Water street and the present approved north bulkhead line of the Anacostia River as shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 23, to strike out:

In case it shall be determined at any future time to locate or carry any public street or highway across said track, the cost and expense thereof shall be borne and defrayed by the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, in the manner provided in section 10 of the act of Congress providing for a Union Station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, approved February 28, 1903.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 4, line 9, after the word "empowered," to strike out "whenever they consider it a public benefit" and insert "upon request of the railroad company," so as to read:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and they are hereby authorized and empowered, upon request of the railroad company, to grant the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company permission to lay, maintain, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 4, line 24, after the word "authorized," to strike out "and the connections necessary at or in the navy-yard" and insert "to a connection with the track system of the navy-yard," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the entire cost and expense of obtaining the necessary right of way and the entire cost and expense of constructing the branch track herein authorized to a connection with the track system of the navy-yard shall be paid and defrayed by the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, but the said Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company shall not acquire any riparian rights by reason of the location of said track through public space or through any right of way necessary to be acquired.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 5, line 10, after the word "highway," to insert "or public space;" in line 11, after the word "approved," to strike out "route" and insert "line;" in line 13, after the word "way," to insert "not exceeding 66 feet in width;" in line 14, after the word "that," to strike out "said" and insert "such;" in line 22, after the word "hereby," to strike out "continued" and insert "reenacted;" on page 6, line 4, after the word "to," to strike out "said" and insert "such," and in line 5, after the word "and," to strike out "the" and insert "any;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That where the line as approved by said Commissioners lies within the bed of any public highway or through any public space, said company is hereby given the right to occupy such portion of said highway or public space as may be approved by said Commissioners, and where such approved line crosses private property, the said railroad company is hereby authorized to acquire a sufficient right of way not exceeding 66 feet in width by purchase, and in the event that such right of way can not be purchased at a price satisfactory to said railroad company, authority is hereby conferred upon said railroad company to condemn the land necessary for such right of way, in the manner and by the method and processes provided by sections 648 to 663, both inclusive, of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, which said sections, despite any repeal thereof, are hereby reenacted in full force and effect, for the purposes contemplated by this act, and are especially enacted to like effect as if the same were incorporated herein at length: Provided, That in every case where an assessment for damages or an award shall have been returned by the appraisers, the company, upon paying into court the amount so assessed or awarded, may enter upon and take possession of the land covered thereby, irrespective of whether exceptions to such assessment or award shall be filed or not, and any subsequent proceedings shall not interfere with or affect such possession, but shall only affect the amount of compensation to be paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 4, on page 5, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That upon the completion of the branch track herein authorized and directed to be constructed within the time and in the manner herein required, the United States shall pay to the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, its successors or assigns, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to reimburse said company for money paid by it for and in securing the necessary rights of way in conformity with this act, and for such purpose the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the words "civilized tribes" it is proposed to strike out the word "late."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], in support of his contention that the Albert Heff case is of no value in the matter before the Senate, quoted the case of McKay v. Kalyton, at the October term, 1906, 204 United States. In that case it was held:

The United States has retained such control over the allotments to Indians that, except as provided by acts of Congress, controversies involving the determination of title to, and right to possession of, Indian allotments while the same are held in trust by the United States are not primarily cognizable by any court, State or Federal. (McKay v. Kalyton, 204 U. S., p. 458.)

The case referred to by the Senator from Kansas is one where the land was held in trust by the United States, but in the case which I am now speaking to the title is not held by the United States in trust, but on the contrary. I call the attention of the Senate to the act of July 1, 1902, page 3, section 21, known as the "Cherokee allotment act:"

Allotment certificates issued by the Dawes Commission shall be conclusive evidence of the right of an allottee to the tract of land described therein, and the United States Indian agent for the Union Agency shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, upon the application of the allottee, place him in possession of his allotment, and shall remove therefrom all persons objectionable to him, and the acts of the Indian agent hereunder shall not be controlled by the writ or process of any court.

In other words, this title to the land passes from the Cherokee people, who owned the land, by virtue of the certificates of allotment, directly to the individual citizen of the United States who was a member of the late Cherokee tribe of Indians.

Therefore this case is not a parallel at all, and that is the distinction I am trying to make here. Where the United States is a trustee for the title, the United States may defend its position as trustee and do whatever is necessary for the maintenance of the right of the trustee, and may forbid taxation when the land is held by the United States as trustee; but when the United States is not a grantor of the land, where the Cherokee people were the grantors of this land, it is different. The Cherokees have owned the land for three-quarters of a century. They bought that land from the United States and they paid for it. It was their own. This land was owned by a given number of United States citizens, and they, by a contract with the United States, agreed to distribute among themselves the owners of that property, and this contract is in the form of statute. Those people were United States citizens and were not a tribe of Indians, because the tribe so called had lost its authority. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Supreme Court holds that when a tribe is given citizenship of the United States as a tribe it ceases to have governmental functions and it ceases to be a tribe within the meaning of the law. The word "tribe" is then used merely as a convenient designation for a given number of persons. The old name which they have borne is continued, and because they were once a Cherokee tribe they continue to be spoken of as the Cherokee tribe, although their legal status is absolutely different.

Whenever the Cherokee people lost their governmental function as a tribe; when they could exercise no dominion over the membership of that tribe; when they could afford no protection to the membership of that tribe, and the individual owend no allegiance to the government of the tribe, that tribe was dead as a governmental organism, and the citizens of the Cherokee tribe now owe no allegiance whatever to that so-called tribe. They owe their allegiance to the State of Oklahoma. Oklahoma has the power of life and death over the members of the late Cherokee tribe of Indians. There is no Cherokee tribe except for convenience of designation, and there is no membership of that tribe except as a method of convenient designation. Those people are citizens of the State of Oklahoma, owing their allegiance to the State of Oklahoma, and Oklahoma owes them the duty of protection, and the duty of protection carries with it the power of protection.

All this debate with regard to those people springs from the desire of the officers of the Federal Government to exercise power over those individual members of the late Five Civilized Tribes, and to maintain that Bureau of the Government which calls for a tremendous appropriation here in this very appropriation bill, hundreds of thousands of dollars to carry on this Bureau of Government in the discharge of the duty of the United States in the first place as trustee to distribute this property.

It has been ten years, ten long years, since the Choctaws and Chickasaws agreed by contract with the United States for the distribution of this property, and still the people of those former tribes await the settlement of this matter, and hundreds of thousands of dollars are being appropriated here now in this very Indian appropriation bill to carry on this business not of protecting the Indians, but of protecting Government employees who find a convenient berth in Oklahoma.

I wish to call attention specifically to the Albert Heff case and to show the important significance of the decision of the Supreme Court, because all of the contention which has been made here in opposition to this argument which I submit was made by the Solicitor-General of the United States, Henry M. Hoyt, in the Albert Heff case. He argued that the tribe was a continuing existence. He argued that because a man was a member of this tribe the United States had jurisdiction over him.

The court held the contrary, that the Government had no jurisdiction, and said this:

It is said that commerce with the Indian tribes includes commerce with the members thereof, and Congress having power to regulate commerce between the white men and the Indians continues to retain that power, although it has provided that the Indian shall have the benefit of and be subject to the civil and criminal laws of the State and shall be a citizen of the United States, and therefore a citizen of the State.

There was the contention, and what does the Supreme Court say in answer to that contention? They say:

But the logic of this argument implies that the United States can never release itself from the obligation of guardianship; that so long as an individual is an Indian by descent, Congress, although it may have granted all the rights and privileges of national and therefore State citizenship, the benefits and burdens of the laws of the State, may at any time repudiate this action and reassume its guardianship and prevent the Indian from enjoying the benefit of the laws of the State and release him from obligations of obedience thereto. Can it be that because one has Indian—and only Indian—blood in his veins he is to be forever one of a special class over whom the General Government may in its discretion assume the rights of guardianship which it has once abandoned, and this whether the State or the individual himself consents? We think the reach to which this argument goes demonstrates that it is unsound.

That is the language of the Supreme Court.

But it is said that the Government has provided that the Indians' title shall not be alienated or encumbered for twenty-five years—

That was in case of a grant from the Government itself, not a grant from United States citizens owning certain property in common and who were granting the title to themselves directly—and it is also stipulated that the grant of citizenship shall not deprive the Indian of his interest in tribal or other property, but these are mere property rights, and do not affect the civil or political status of the allottees. In United States v. Rickert (188 United States, 432) we sustained the right of the Government to protect the lands thus allotted and patented from any encumbrance of State taxation.

In the Rickert case the United States was trustee of the title. In Oklahoma, in the Five Tribes, the United States is not trustee of the title. But these lands go direct to the people who owned them, who are United States citizens, to the individual member of the community, and the allotment certificate vests him with all the right to that land, and he does not even need a patent. As far as I am concerned I should be entirely content to abandon the issuance of patents to the lands in that country. We do not need any of those patents. A patent is merely an evidence of title. A patent is not title. You may take a patent and put it in the fire and burn it up and the title will remain. A patent is merely a piece of paper intended as evidence of title. The title itself is vested by virtue of the law, which places the right to the property in the hands of the individual and in his ownership.

The Supreme Court goes on to say in this case:

But it is unnecessary to pursue this discussion further. We are of the opinion that when the United States grants the privileges of citizenship to an Indian, gives to him the benefit of and requires him to be subject to the laws, both civil and criminal, of the State, it places him outside the reach of police regulations on the part of Congress; that the emancipation from Federal control thus created can not be set aside at the instance of the Government without the consent of the individual Indian and the State, and that this emancipation from Federal control is not affected by the fact that the lands it has granted to the Indian are granted subject to a condition against alienation and incumbrance, or the further fact that it guarantees to him an interest in tribal or other property.

Mr. President, in this case, where the tribe by its own act terminated the social compact which bound the people together as a tribe, where every single governmental function has departed, where the so-called "chief" is nothing but a clerk of the Interior Department, where he has no executive power whatever except to sign his name to these so-called "patents," where he is made subservient by his salary to the power that pays him—I say the proper designation for such a tribe is the late Five Civilized Tribes, because the word "late" has been ordinarily used by the Government to describe a tribe which has lost governmental functions.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] asked me whether or not the State of Oklahoma has a right to tax these lands. I assert that undoubtedly it has the right to tax those lands notwithstanding the fact that these United States citizens, called members of the Five Tribes, agreed with the United States before Oklahoma was established that the land should not be taxable. But when a State is established, and when these individuals themselves establish the State, and when they become members of the State, owing allegiance to the State——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to see whether I understand the Senator. Does he state that the State of Oklahoma has power to levy a tax before the expiration of the period of restriction?

Mr. OWEN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is his position?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is not that absolutely overruled in the Rickert case?

Mr. OWEN. It is not, for the reason that in the Rickert case the United States was trustee of the title and in this case there is no trustee of the title. The title to the land which I have in Oklahoma as an allottee is in me direct and there is no trustee.

Does the Senator recognize the distinction between a case where the United States is trustee and where the United States is not trustee? The distinction is so plain that no man need to err therein.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator wherein there is a distinction between the Sisseton and Wahpeton tribes, under the law as it then existed, and the Five Civilized Tribes?

Wherein did one tribe differ from the other? Both had practically the same grants; both had practically the same laws relating to their citizenship and the rights and immunities of that citizenship. Then wherein was there a trustee over the Sisseton tribe different from that over the other tribes?

Mr. OWEN. I will ask the Senator a question, and that is, whether or not these allotments were made to the United States in trust for the Wahpeton and Sisseton members?

Mr. McCUMBER. They were not. It was a direct deed, a patent to the allottees with a restrictive clause in it; nothing more or less. There was nothing else than the restriction on sale.

Mr. OWEN. Then the United States is not a trustee in that case. Is that the Senator's contention?

Mr. McCUMBER. I was simply trying to get the position of the Senator, not desiring to take part in the argument at this time. My position is that there was a trusteeship over the person and over the property during that period.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] does not insist upon a trusteeship of the person, I believe.

Mr. CURTIS. I said the Government is exercising a trust over the property.

I do not say that the Government is exercising a right over the personal conduct of the individual member of a tribe, so as to interfere with the police power of the State. But I insist that, under the law, the Government still controls the property until the restriction period has expired, and the Senator from Oklahoma has an allotment subject to certain restrictions, and his lands can not be sold for a certain length of time.

Mr. OWEN. The distinction is this: The Wahpeton and Sisseton Indians were blanket Indians. In the case of the Wahpeton and Sisseton Sioux the United States was the supervising power. They were aliens, and in this case the citizenship of the Cherokee Nation, for example, comprised not Indians within the meaning of the law, but comprised citizens of the United States, who had the right of contract before they entered into the contract of July 1, 1902, by the approval of this act of Congress distributing that so-called "tribal property," and being citizens of the United States and being the grantors themselves to their individual members as grantees, they might impose, if you will, a restriction upon the title; but the United States, having nothing whatever to do with the ownership of the property, has no right whatever to impose a condition upon the grantee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. Did not the Supreme Court in the case of Stevens v. The Cherokee Nation decide that the land and money of the tribes were common property, tribal property, and tribal money?

Mr. OWEN. In the Stevens case, which arose with regard to the constitutionality of an act of Congress providing for the making up of the rolls of the Cherokee people, the court held that that act was constitutional. The United States was obliged to distribute the property to do away with those old tribal governments.

Mr. CURTIS rose.

Mr. OWEN. Allow me to complete my answer. Then I will yield to another question.

The United States in that case was obliged to distribute this property in order to do away with these old tribal governments. It was the intention of the act of 1893, in establishing the Dawes Commission, to do away with these so-called "tribal governments." The act of 1897 did away with their judicial authority, and the act of 1898 did away with what remained of the tribal authority; and I think no one is more familiar with the destructive force of that act than the gentleman who drew the act and who now represents here in part the State of Kansas.

Those tribal governments were intended to be destroyed by the Curtis Act, so called, and they were destroyed by the Curtis Act; and as soon as that transpired, being interested in those people, I undertook to secure for them full citizenship, so that they might be able to defend themselves without being subject to the supervisory control of the Interior Department; and it was done by the act of March 3, 1901.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator admits, does he not, that there is quite a large amount of property there to be distributed?

Mr. OWEN. I admit that there is a large amount of property there yet to be distributed, and the owners of that property yet to be distributed are citizens of the United States. They are not Indians. They do not comprise a tribe of Indians, because the true meaning of "a tribe" is a community having the power of government in some degree, and therefore in order to be a living governmental organism must exercise some control over its membership.

Mr. CURTIS. They still have legislatures and chiefs, do they not?

Mr. OWEN. I have already stated that they have chiefs appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and a legislature under the same dominating force who do not represent those people and whose sentiments are not the sentiments of those people. They have joined the great army of sinecures, and their sympathies are with the salaried class, who have a good reason to wish to continue for a long time the winding up of affairs in Oklahoma; and it is against that long-continued winding up of affairs in Oklahoma that I am protesting.

The only way they can continue to exercise supervisory control is by maintaining this theory that there is a tribe down in that country, that these dead governments are living governmental organisms, and since they are not, since they have no functions, since their laws can not be carried out, since they have no laws, I insist upon it that the word "late" is a proper description, and I insist upon it, moreover, that it is a highly necessary description, unless it is intended by the United States to attempt to perpetuate this bureaucratic government in Oklahoma for some period of years longer. Our people desire peace. They desire the opportunity to be free, to develop their own affairs, and they want to be delivered from this attempted supervisory control.

There is a case before the Supreme Court which will be decided before very long, to determine whether or not this power can be extended for twenty-five years over those of our citizens who happen to be of a larger measure of Indian blood, those who are classed as full bloods. We expect a decision by the Supreme Court before very long on that question. I, for one, have not the slightest doubt that it will be decided that the United States had no right to extend the restrictions on these lands in Oklahoma.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I fully sympathize with the Senator in his general proposition, but I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. When we passed the act two years ago there was some question—I think perhaps the importance of it was exaggerated—as to the legal effect of discontinuing the tribal government, with reference to some existing or pretended land grant. It may have been exaggerated, and I think perhaps it was. In view of the action of the Senate at that time, I should not want in this bill, in this way, to declare that those tribal governments should no longer exist. While in sympathy with the Senator on the main question, I will vote for the amendment.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it is true that there was a pretext offered for extending the tribal existence of the so-called "Five Civilized Tribes," and the absurdity of that extension will appear in a moment.

Here is a community of people who by their own vote dissolve the social compact that binds them together. They have no executive authority; they have no judiciary; they have no legislative authority; they have no forum in which any law could be enforced if they should pass one, and they are forbidden to pass any kind of a law, except a resolution of adjournment, without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. They have absolutely no power on earth. They do not comprise any organized community in any sense of the word.

It is on account of the so-called "land grant" of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad that this was extended—a land grant which on its face is absolutely preposterous; a land grant that no lawyer would for a moment say had the slightest value or color of right. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in discussing that land grant. I only say that it was an obvious pretext, and the real purpose of extending the tribe, so called, was to maintain this bureau government, against which I now protest.

But more than that, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the gross absurdity of this proposition. Here is a community of United States citizens who by their own vote dissolved the so-called "tribe," and having dissolved the tribe and terminated their social compact that made it a tribe the United States comes along after two or three years and passes an act declaring that the tribal life is extended, and proposes to make me a citizen of the late tribe—a member of an extinct Indian tribe. They drag the Cherokee Nation from the cerements of the grave, give it vitality, and make me a member of it. I earnestly submit such a proposition violates every sentiment of reason and common sense.

The argument shows how preposterous this proposition is, and how anyone can justify himself in saying that this is a living, governmental organism now passes my comprehension.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think that very many of the Senators are wasting a great deal of sympathy upon the Senator from Oklahoma. I do not think he needs any. I think he is thoroughly able to take care of himself. Nor do I think that anyone has wasted any sympathy upon the white men of Oklahoma who still take the name of Indians because there may be a sixteenth or a thirty-second amount of Indian blood in their veins. But there is some sympathy in the United States for the full-blood Indians, for the real Indian, and there are a great number of them in the new State of Oklahoma. If the reports that we get from that section are correct, and the report that we get from the special committee that investigated the affairs down in New Mexico is one-tenth of it correct, it seems to me that sympathy is not in the slightest degree wasted.

It may be possible that we have legislated the Indian out of the control of Congress. If we have done so, then nine-tenths of the bill which the Senator from Oklahoma is supporting here to-day is a mere nullity, and there is nothing left for Congress to do except year after year to vote the proper annuities that shall go to those Indians under previous contracts or under treaties that were made years ago. That would be the sole function of Congress, so far as it relates to Indian matters, provided they are not the wards of the Government at the present time. But if we are assuming that they are wards of the Government, as every Indian appropriation bill has assumed, notwithstanding any of these laws, it seems to me that we are not doing anything so wonderfully ridiculous if we are consistent and declare that they are wards of our Government for the purpose of protecting their property interest, and that is as far as any bill that I know of proposes to go.

Mr. OWEN rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator wish to ask me a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. OWEN. The mere continuance of a policy does not justify it. I ask the Senator from North Dakota if he is referring to the so-called "restrictions" bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. I refer to that in connection with other provisions in the bill. For instance, we are educating those people. We are spending thousands, even millions, of dollars in the education of those Indians. On what assumption? On the assumption that they are the wards of the Government and need the assistance and the education which alone the Government could give them.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the appropriation for the schools in Oklahoma, while the State is organizing, I think is justified because it goes to the education of white people and not of the Indian people. The Indians have their own money for their own schools, and have been conducting their own schools abundantly for a long period of time—for seventy-five years.

Mr. McCUMBER. We all understand that; but the provision of this bill relates to the education of Indians all over the United States who are declared to be citizens just as fully as the Indians of Oklahoma have been declared to be citizens.

Mr. OWEN. I am in favor of educating the poor whites. I am in favor of educating anybody who is poor. I do not believe money can be better expended than for that purpose. But because of sympathy with the person I do not think it wise or just that the Federal Government should invade the rights of a State and undertake to take charge of hundreds of thousands of people who are citizens of a State and who owe their allegiance to the State and who will be taken care of by the State if they should be pauperized in any way. The State of Oklahoma will take charge of its own poor, and it will educate its own children.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not considering the question whether Oklahoma will educate its own citizens. The Government of the United States, being unable to grant lands, as it has done to other States, granted in lieu, I think, $5,000,000 in the act which allowed Oklahoma to come into the Union. This bill is made up of appropriations for the purpose of educating the Indians all over the United States. I do not know of more than one or two reservations, and I am not certain as to those at the present time, where those Indians are not citizens of the United States. And yet we are educating them; we are paying out money to give them a special education and to prepare them for what we call "the white man's civilization."

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest to the Senator that, while I am thoroughly in sympathy with his argument, he might add that there are a great many of the pupils for whom we appropriate $1,400,000 who have money in the Treasury that we do not care to give them.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is true.

Mr. CLAPP. Still, we are going on expending public money to educate those people, and those funds are piling up, and we dare not distribute them for fear that they will be squandered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have great doubt myself, Mr. President, about making of a real Indian a white man. I do not think it is possible to do so. I have long since come to the conclusion that the better policy of the United States would have been to have made the best possible Indian out of them instead of trying to change their nature and to place them upon a footing where they can compete with the white man. Thousands upon thousands of generations of inheritance have fitted the white man to battle with the world against adversity. It has not fitted the Indian to make the same character of battle. You may find exceptions here and there among the full-blood Indians, but if you place the majority of Indians upon the same footing as the white man and say, "Here is the world before you; you have intellect and you have strength; make your way in the world as a white man makes his way," 99 per cent of them will make a complete failure and become paupers.

History has taught us that. The Government understands that to-day as it never has understood it before, and as we take control of reservation after reservation the Indian is crowded out. We remove the restrictions, and the white man becomes the owner of the land. The Indians of California are now coming before us and asking that we buy land again for them, where they can lay their weary heads, and we have got to buy the land for them and we have got to take care of them or we have simply to send them to a pauper's house. We might just as well face that condition at one time as another. I am speaking of the real Indian. I am not speaking of the white men who have some Indian blood in their veins, because such a man can generally take care of himself.

These men still need the protecting arm of the Government. We have taken from them everything on God's green earth that they owned; we have despoiled them of their fair inheritance; we have taken their land whenever we wanted it for the white men; we have given them a mere beggarly allowance and the right to exist; and we have placed over them agents and kept them within certain confines, and have been trying all the time to see if we could not make white men out of them. Now, having failed upon that proposition, we are brought face to face with a condition either to take care of these Indians in some way or to turn them over as paupers to the several States to take care of them.

I am willing, Mr. President, to stretch the law. I might, if it is possible to do it, take some chances, until the Supreme Court has decided that we have lost the control over them to see if we can not remedy some of the wrongs that have been perpetrated against them and still take care of some of their lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota failed to enumerate all of the things which had been taken away from the Indians, and I want to mention a few for his consideration. The chief thing which has been taken away from the Indian is his self-reliance, his self-respect. That he should be treated as a curio and made a pauper of by this system of governmental pension will ruin any man. It will ruin a white man. I have spoiled several young men myself by pensioning them. It will spoil any man when you take away from him the individual initiative. The chief thing of which the Indian has a right to complain is that his self-respect and self-reliance have been taken away from him by this system of governmental support and governmental nursing, which really means the paying of salaries to men who want to have the salaries and who are more concerned about the maintenance of such conditions than they are about the welfare of the Indians.

The full bloods in my own country have never been paupers. They sustain themselves. They were self-supporting always. They were self-supporting before Columbus landed on the shores of this continent, and they have not only supported themselves, but they have educated their children and they have framed laws that were respectable.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me add one thing to that. They supported themselves so long as they had their lands, and from the moment you robbed them of their lands they have not been self-supporting, and they never will be. They were able to support themselves upon their lands before the days of Columbus, before the white man took the land and took the game from the land. He took the old-fashioned means of the Indian to gain his livelihood and he tried to make a farmer out of him and he tried to make a mechanic out of him. He took them to the school some miles distant from here and has been trying to make professional men out of them, but it has been a failure along the whole line. The Indian belongs to the land. You can not separate him from God's earth. The moment you do separate him from the land you have made a pauper out of him. The moment you take him away from that which for thousands and hundreds of thousands of years belonged to him, and upon which he had been educated, and where he had gained all of his inherent characteristics, you take away his only means of livelihood.

Now, we have learned that, Mr. President, and, having learned it, it seems to me that it is our duty, so far as it is possible, to hold this last vestige of the Indian's rights, and that is some place where he can live. That is what we are attempting to do in holding these restrictions, because the moment that you release the land from the restrictions the superior ability of the white man, his persuasive qualities and his persistency in getting hold of property, will overcome the resisting mind of the Indian and, like a child, he will finally give away his property. He will generally ask three or four times what it is really worth, in the first instance, but if you hold to him long enough he will sell it for one-tenth of what it is worth. That is the experience we are having all over the country to-day wherever we have absolutely separated the Indian from his land or, what is equivalent to that, have removed the restrictions so that they can sell the land.

I have stated in arguments heretofore that I am somewhat doubtful as to whether the amendment which I secured in 1906, extending the restrictions twenty-five years, will be sustained. I hope it will. I can see many reasons why it should be sustained. If we should take the general sentiment of the expressions of the courts upon the subject, I would be inclined to think that that would be their final holding. We gave the Indian political rights, but by giving him those political rights, those rights of citizenship, we did not necessarily release ourselves from the right of control as a guardian over a ward.

I know the Senator takes a different view from that, but I want to call attention to this one case that has been referred to so often—the Rickert case. Let me give you the law that governed the Rickert case. We will take section 6 of chapter 119 of the laws of 1887. That law provided as follows:

> That upon the completion of said allotments and the patenting of the lands to said allottees, each and every member of the respective bands or tribes of Indians to whom allotments have been made, shall have the benefit of and be subject to the laws, both civil and criminal, of the State or Territory in which they may reside; and no Territory shall pass or enforce any law denying any such Indians within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law. And every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States, to whom allotments shall have been made under the provisions of this act * * * is hereby declared to be a citizen of the United States and is entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such citizens, etc.

That is just as broad an application of the law as it would be possible to make. This, remember, was in 1887. In 1901 this same law was extended over the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma. Thirteen years after that law became effective, and at least ten years after the allotments had been made under it, and which allotments, by the very argument of the Senator from Oklahoma, made these Indians absolute citizens of the United States when the Indian had received his paper title with the restrictions upon it, the county of Roberts, in the State of South Dakota, levied a tax, both personal and real, a real-estate tax against the land and a personal-property tax against the personal property of the Indian as well.

Mr. OWEN. Which had been granted to him.

Mr. McCUMBER. Which had been granted to him by the Government of the United States.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will make it perfectly clear and fair to the Senator. I will read what the court said. The court knew of this law, the court knew in that decision that thirteen years prior to the time of the levy of this tax these people had been declared citizens with all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States, and yet in that decision in United States v. Rickert, the court uses this language:

> These Indians are yet wards of the Nation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the clear wording of the Supreme Court after these men had been declared to be citizens of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator maintain that now those persons who were members of the "Five Civilized Tribes" are still wards?

Mr. McCUMBER. For the property which has been granted them and the protection of that property, yes; absolutely. Now, let me ask the Senator, does not this decision so state, that these men had been declared to be citizens? I am giving him the language of the Supreme Court of the United States on the subject. It is not my own.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, even the Supreme Court of the United States may use an inadvertent term. I have already agreed with the Senator from North Dakota that where the United States is trustee of the title, the United States as such trustee may defend its right of trustee and prevent such land from being taxed. But in this case——

Mr. McCUMBER. It is but perfectly fair to state, in answer to the Senator, that I do not think it was necessary to use this language in the decision of that case.

Mr. OWEN. Of course not. In the Albert Heff case the language itself is absolutely set aside by the Supreme Court in a later decision, which was in point and which went right to the soul of that matter, and in which they declared that John Butler was not a ward.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not agree that they declared he was not a ward so far as his property rights were concerned. They declare that he was subject to the police jurisdiction and laws of the States, and that we do not deny. They have never attempted to overrule the cases in which they tried to make a clear distinction between the political rights which are granted and those rights of property over which they say they have control, and have such control because they regard the Indian as still the ward of the Government.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator from North Dakota say that the United States is trustee of an allotment in the Cherokee Nation?

Mr. McCUMBER. I say that the Government of the United States is trustee of every allotment containing a restriction.

Mr. OWEN. Whether it is in the contract or not?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is in the law. The contract is the instrument under which the grant has been made, and that is the law. If the law declares that the property shall not be subject to sale for twenty-five years, then I maintain that for twenty-five years that property is not subject to taxation by the State. If that is not true, then, the very protection that the Government intended to exercise for the benefit of the Indians is absolutely without effect, and the States can come in and, through a process of tax sale, can deprive the Indian of the very property which the Government itself declared he could not alienate. In other words, the Senator's position leads him to this proposition, that while the Government can say to the Indian or to the allottee, if he is a citizen of the United States, "You may hold this land with a restriction against sale for twenty-five years," the purchaser at a tax sale will take it free from that restriction imposed upon it by the Government. I am not willing to concede that proposition. I believe there is vitality in that restriction, and that citizenship does not affect it or lessen its value in any degree.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. What I have tried to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to is that these lands did not belong to the United States; they belonged to the people composing that community, who were at that time citizens of the United States. They were not at that time a tribe, and while they acquiesced in a five years' restriction on the title, which as the grantors of the title they had a right to do and it is binding on the grantee, the legal title will remain in the grantee for that period of time.

Mr. McCUMBER. What title does the Senator claim was held by the individual Indian before the allotment? Was it a title in common with all the Indians?

Mr. OWEN. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. Was it a tenancy in common or a joint tenancy, or what was the legal title of the Indian?

Mr. OWEN. It was a title under a social compact existing between these individuals of a peculiar nature that is ordinarily known as the Indian title.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and the Indian title, Mr. President, was simply a right of possession subject actually to the control of the Government of the United States.

Mr. OWEN. No, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. No one has ever broadened the Indian title into a greater title than that of a mere possessory right so long as the Government saw fit to accord them that right.

Mr. OWEN. The courts of the United States have held that that was a fee title, and it will not do for the Senator from North Dakota to deny that title. It was practically a fee simple given by the treaty of 1835 to these people and later confirmed in other treaties.

Mr. McCUMBER. Could the Indians sell it without the consent of the Government? Could they alienate it or mortgage it in any way without the consent of the Government? If they could not, then certainly it was not a fee title in that sense. Suppose the tribe had gone out of existence entirely, had been wiped out of existence, what would have become of the lands? Would they have gone to the heirs of the tribe, or would they have reverted immediately to the Government?

Mr. OWEN. When you wipe them out, you do not leave them any heirs, Mr. President. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCUMBER. I say wipe out the tribe. The Senator is mistaken. There are very many heirs of those Indian tribes that are scattered over the United States to-day who are not members of the tribe and not on the rolls. So, the Senator is entirely in error when he says if the tribe is wiped out there can be no descendants.

Mr. OWEN. When the Senator made——

Mr. McCUMBER. The law of tribal relation is one thing; the law of descent is entirely another thing. A man might or a child might be a descendant from some Indian of that tribe and have no tribal rights whatever to the property. So, I deny that proposition of the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator in wiping out the——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. OWEN. I thought the Senator in suggesting the wiping out of the so-called Cherokee Indians had supposed them wiped out completely. In his mental supposition, however, he left enough of them apparently to meet my suggestion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not as tribesmen, by any means.

Mr. OWEN. But I understand thoroughly what the title of the Cherokee lands is. They were granted all the right that the United States had. Of course the United States, as a sovereign power, would be the party to whom the lands would escheat in case the Indian people, who were on the lands and who owned them, should leave the country or go away and have no representatives. That, of course, is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. That was provided even in the treaty, I am informed.

Mr. OWEN. No; it was not provided in the treaty; it was written in the patent.

Mr. CURTIS. It was provided in the treaty.

Mr. OWEN. It was written in the patent.

Mr. CURTIS. It was provided in the treaty also.

Mr. OWEN. The agreement which was made in the first place with these people was that they should have this land absolutely; but it is the common practice to write in the face of the patent that in case they abandon the land it shall revert to the Government. That, however, does not diminish the quality of the title at all. What I was calling the Senator's attention to was that this people, as a community, owned this land; they were citizens of the United States at the time they made this agreement; and while they could impose on the title granted their individual members this condition the United States has no power to do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I am trying to impress upon the Senator is the fact that those Indians did not get such a title to the land as we get by a Government patent to our own lands—exclusive control over them. The original grant, which was practically to the tribe without an allotment, is not such a fee simple as would go to the individual, and has never been regarded as such. If the Indians should as a tribe remove entirely over into Mexico and abandon that land, I do not think that they could claim a title or could dispose of it in any way and take the proceeds of it. No court has ever decided that they could; and if they could not, then it follows that they did not have the fee title in the general sense in which we use that term.

But I was considering the Rickert case and what the court stated. Perhaps the language was not necessary in order to decide that case, but the Supreme Court, in connection with the law which was before it and which was being tested, did say that, having acquired the right of absolute citizenship, with all of its privileges and immunities, the State could not tax that real property by making it subject to the laws of the State.

The Supreme Court not only denied that proposition, but it denied it upon the ground—whether necessary or not—that "these Indians are yet wards of the nation, in a condition of pupilage or dependency, and have not been discharged from that condition."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Notwithstanding the fact that they declared and the law declared that they were citizens of the United States, the Supreme Court declared that they had not been discharged from that wardship. That is the proposition I want to make clear. I am not saying that the court will not reverse the wording of this decision whenever it shall pass upon the amendment to which the Senator has referred and the amendment which, on my motion, was engrafted on the bill some two years ago extending the period of the restriction.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. I can not feel that the Senator ought to ignore a later decision of the court. He is making exactly the same argument which Henry Hoyt, the Solicitor-General, made in the Albert Heff case, and which was overruled by the Supreme Court. He is making the exact argument over again.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think, Mr. President, that the proposition under which my argument is based has been overruled. If it had been overruled, there would be no occasion whatever for bringing the case before the Supreme Court which the Senator from Oklahoma says will soon be decided. The question has never been squarely passed upon by the court with reference to the property. I have tried to make it clear that the court had decided that political rights were one thing—in the Heff case they passed upon that question—and they have declared that property rights are of another character; and that has been decided in another way.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I will state that in the case to which I referred this morning, reported in 204 United States Supreme Court Reports, the Rickert case is referred to with approval.

Mr. OWEN. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that the case referred to was a case in which the United States held land in trust, which is not the case with the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator is making a distinction without a difference. The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that the Government does have control of the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to follow the language of the Supreme Court further. As I have said, I can not imagine why they should use that language unless there was a conviction that the right of the United States over the property of the Indian had not passed in any degree, because they further say:

> These Indians are yet wards of the nation, in a condition of pupilage or dependency, and have not been discharged from that condition. They are occupying these lands with the consent and authority of the United States; and the holding of them by the United States under the act of 1887, * * * is a part of the national policy by which the Indians are to be maintained as well as prepared for assuming the habits of civilized life, and ultimately the privileges of citizenship. To tax these lands is to tax an instrumentality employed by the United States for the benefit and control of this dependent race, and to accomplish beneficent objects with respect to a race of which this court has said that "from their very weakness and helplessness, so largely due to the course of dealing of the Federal Government with them and the treaties in which it has been promised, there arises the duty of protection, and with it, the power."

It will be remembered that the court went further than the mere matter of determining that a tax upon that land was invalid. It also broadly held that a tax upon the personal property, upon horses and cattle, was invalid. To be sure it stated and used the language that the property had been given them, but, as I understand, there was no evidence whatever that this was the identical property—personal property, I refer to now—which passed from the Government, but that it related to any of the personal property that was held by the Indians.

Mr. President, I myself believe that in all other matters, as well as educational matters, it is proper at least for Congress to assume that the Indian is still the ward of the Government, and to be protected. When the Supreme Court of the United States decides that we are in error upon this proposition it will be time enough to reverse our policy.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, Benjamin Jowett, the late very eminent master of Baliol College at Oxford, in England, once said to a gathering of his students: "We are none of us infallible; we are all likely to make mistakes, even the youngest of us." I am never so impressed with a sense of human fallibility as when I am called upon to consider some of these complex and difficult Indian questions about which I feel very strongly my ignorance.

This is a proposition to strike out a word which if left in will have a very important effect upon existing laws of the United States. I shall not attempt to say anything on the legal propositions which have just been so ably discussed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], but I am interested in maintaining what seems to me a correct principle in legislation.

These Five Civilized Tribes, whether their members have become citizens of the United States or not, still exist for certain purposes as legal entities. They are referred to in the very bill before us repeatedly later on as the Five Civilized Tribes, and the United States maintains relations to them in that capacity. Whether those relations are limited or not seems to me to have no bearing upon the question. The resolution read by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] appears to me to put it beyond doubt that the intention of Congress and the intention of existing laws was to maintain those certain and limited relations toward those tribes.

Not very long ago an amendment was offered, which I think was finally adopted, relating to certain lands in New York in which the Six Nations had an interest. I do not now recall the precise purpose of the amendment, but it is not of importance to my argument. The surviving members of the Six Nations in New York are all citizens of the United States, and I think the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] will confirm me in saying that they have been citizens for some generations. But in that amendment we do not refer to them as the "late Six Nations" or the "late Iroquois." We refer to them as "the people of the Six Nations," because it was in that relation the United States was connected with them.

We have in my own State a remnant of an Indian tribe known as the "Mashpee." For many years they have had a township of their own; they are citizens of the State; they are citizens of the United States. They are never referred to in our statutes as the "late Mashpee Indians," but are referred to as "the Mashpee Indians," merely for convenience of designation in that case, because the relation of the State to them in the capacity of guardian has long since ceased.

The insertion of this word will have the effect, it seems to me, of contradicting our whole course of legislation. Therefore it is of great importance that such a far-reaching change should not be lightly made. If we are prepared to alter the course of legislation which has been adopted after consideration by Congress, that is one thing and a proposition to be argued on the broadest ground, but to contradict existing legislation or to attempt to overthrow it by the insertion of a word in an appropriation bill seems to me not consonant with the best practices of legislation here. It seems to me it would be unwise for the Senate, after this brief discussion, to make such a fundamental and far-reaching change in our laws as they now exist as this would import.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the Secretary state that amendment. I rather think its adoption necessitates a further amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 20, after the word "buildings," it is proposed to insert the words "on lands heretofore belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes."

Mr. CLAPP. I now suggest that the words in lines 11 and 12, on page 4, be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, lines 11 and 12, it is proposed to strike out "and this provision shall apply to the Five Civilized Tribes."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Commissioner," on page 4, line 15, after the words "use of," to insert "irrigating tools and appliances and purchase of;" in line 17, after the word "lines," to insert "and," and in line 20, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which $25,000 shall be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

For construction of ditches and reservoirs, purchase and use of irrigating tools and appliances and purchase of water rights, including lands necessary for canals, pipe lines, and reservoirs for Indian reservations, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and subject to his control, $200,000, of which $25,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 7, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which $15,000 shall be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

For survey and subdivision of Indian reservations and of lands to be allotted to Indians, and to make allotments in severalty, to be expended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $75,000, of which $15,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior to take action to suppress the traffic of intoxicating liquors among Indians, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 15, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three" and insert "four," so as to make the clause read:

For support of Indian day and industrial schools, and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for, $1,400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 15, to insert:

To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to conduct experiments on Indian school or agency farms, in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture, designed to test the possibility of soil, climate, etc., in the cultivation of trees, grains, vegetables, and fruits not hitherto raised in those neighborhoods, using Indian labor in the process, $5,000.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the purpose of the words in that amendment, "in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture?" It seems to me that it would be better if we left it entirely to the Indian Bureau; otherwise there may be some conflict of jurisdiction. I think the Bureau of Indian Affairs could cooperate with the Department of Agriculture without this language and would be entirely independent. I do not know what authority the Department of Agriculture might assume, but, as a rule, one Department or the other has absolute control of these affairs. I do not intend to make any objection to it. I only thought I would call the Senator's attention to the matter.

Mr. CLAPP. Those words were inserted at the request of the Indian Office, so that where the Agricultural Department was carrying on irrigation work and it was advisable to unite the two on some of these reservation works they could do so. I myself rather think, on reflection, that the words "in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture" might be stricken out. The Departments could cooperate without this language being used.

Mr. TELLER. I think they could, Mr. President, and I think it would be less liable to complication if the Department were left to do as it saw fit.

Mr. CLAPP. I move to strike out the words, on lines 17 and 18 in the amendment, "in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 17, after the word "farms," it is proposed to strike out "in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued, as follows:

That all expenditure of money herein or hereafter appropriated for school purposes among the Indians shall be at all times under the supervision and direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and in all respects in conformity with such conditions, rules, and regulations as to the conduct and methods of instruction and expenditure of money as may be from time to time prescribed by him, subject to the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That, except for pay of superintendents, not more than $167——

Mr. TELLER. I wish to understand what is the meaning of the language on page 7, beginning with the proviso in line 5, which has just been read by the Secretary. The proviso reads:

Provided, That, except for pay of superintendents, etc.

I suppose it must mean that the per capita expenditure shall not include the pay of superintendents. Is that what it means?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes. That was in the bill as it came over to us from the House.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to it if that is what it means.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, on page 7, line 12, after the word "necessary," to strike out "for the efficient operation of the school affected;" and in line 15, after the word "expenditure," to strike out "such expenditure to continue only so long as the said necessity therefor shall exist," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That, except for pay of superintendents, not more than $167 shall be expended for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any school herein specifically provided for, except when, by reason of epidemic, accident, or other sufficient cause, the attendance is so reduced or cost of maintenance so high that a larger expenditure is absolutely necessary, when the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may allow a larger per capita expenditure.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 10, to insert:

That hereafter any United States Indian agent, superintendent, or other disbursing agent of the Indian Service may deposit Indian moneys, individual or tribal, coming into his hands as custodian, in such national bank or banks as he may select: Provided, That the bank or banks so selected by him shall first execute to said disbursing agent a bond, with approved surety, in such an amount as will properly safeguard the funds to be deposited. Such bond shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 19, to insert:

That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to send a special Indian agent, or other representative of his Office, to visit the following-named Indian tribes: Choctaw, Pottawatomie (Kansas), Senecas of New York, Six Nations of New York, Pawnees, and the Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi, for the purpose of conferring and negotiating and entering into a written agreement with each tribe for the commutation of the perpetual annuities due them under treaty stipulations; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall transmit to Congress at its next regular session said agreements with such recommendations as he may deem proper.

Mr. CLAPP. I move to amend the amendment by inserting, in line 23, page 8, after the word "Choctaw" the words "Chickasaw, Cherokee, Seminole, Creek."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous," on page 9, line 16, after the word "That," to insert "hereafter," so as to read:

Provided, That hereafter warehouses for the receipt, storage, and shipment of goods for the Indian Service shall be maintained at the following places; New York, Chicago, Omaha, St. Louis, and San Francisco.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 20, after the word "That," to insert "hereafter," so as to make the further proviso read:

Provided further, That hereafter payment for transportation of Indian goods and supplies shall include all Indian transportation lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 6, after the word "That," to insert "hereafter," so as to read:

Provided further, That hereafter in expending money appropriated for this purpose a railroad company which has not received aid in bonds of the United States, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "II. General officers and employees," on page 11, after line 15, to strike out:

INSPECTORS.

For pay of eight Indian inspectors, two of whom shall be engineers, one to be designated as chief, competent in the location, construction, and maintenance of irrigation works, at $2,500 per annum each, except the chief engineer, who shall receive $3,500, $21,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 22, to strike out:

For traveling expenses of eight Indian inspectors, at $3 per day when actually employed on duty in the field, exclusive of transportation and sleeping-car fare, in lieu of all other expenses now authorized by law, and for incidental expenses of negotiation, inspection, and investigation, including telegraphing and expenses of going to and going from the seat of government, and while remaining there under orders and direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for a period not to exceed twenty days, $12,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Superintendent of Indian Schools," on page 12, line 17, after the word "law," to insert: "And hereafter he shall perform such other duties as may be imposed upon him by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior;" so as to make the clause read:

For necessary traveling expenses of one superintendent of Indian schools, including telegraphing and incidental expenses of inspection and investigation, $1,500: Provided, That he shall be allowed $3 per day for traveling expenses when actually on duty in the field, exclusive of cost of transportation and sleeping-car fare in lieu of all other expenses now allowed by law. And hereafter he shall perform such other duties as may be imposed upon him by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota what is the purpose of this amendment?

Mr. CLAPP. That was put in there so that the superintendent——

Mr. KEAN. It is the superintendent of Indian schools. What other duties are there for him to perform?

Mr. CLAPP. He is the general superintendent. He is not at any Indian school. The Department finds there are times when it might employ him on other work, and it desires authority to do so.

Mr. KEAN. Do you not think there ought to be some limitation on the superintendent? Ought he to be employed for every purpose?

Mr. CLAPP. I think he ought to be kept busy.

Mr. KEAN. I think he ought to be employed to look after the schools.

Mr. CLAPP. He is primarily. The amendment says:

And hereafter he shall perform such other duties as may be imposed upon him by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

If he is not engaged all the time, and if there is other work that he can do, the idea of the Commissioner was that he should have that authority.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I can not conceive what he can be assigned to that will be beneficial more than what he is doing under his present office. There certainly is not any time for the superintendent of schools to do additional work. He will do very well if he succeeds in visiting all the schools in the course of the year.

Mr. CLAPP. A lady holds this office.

Mr. TELLER. I know.

Mr. CLAPP. It is not designed that this lady shall in any manner lessen her interest in or her attention to or her work for the schools, but the Commissioner suggested that there were times when that work was not sufficient to keep her engaged, and he simply wanted authority in such a case, as anyone else would, with anybody under his employ, to keep her busy.

Mr. TELLER. She must be a very remarkable woman if she can discharge those duties, without having other duties imposed upon her. Of course I do not care to interfere with the administration of the office.

Mr. KEAN. Is not this an indirect way of increasing some one's compensation?

Mr. CLAPP. No; not at all. There is no additional compensation provided for.

Mr. KEAN. But there is additional compensation here allowed.

Mr. CLAPP. How?

Mr. KEAN. There is an additional compensation of $3 a day for traveling expenses.

Mr. CLAPP. That has always been there.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey, with some little knowledge that I have of the duties of that office, that the allowance for traveling expenses will be fully consumed every day in the year which can be spared outside of the main office. For myself, I can not imagine a reason for this, and I have been looking through the report to see the reason given by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for this amendment. The Senator from Colorado says it must be a very remarkable woman who is in charge of this office. The Senator from Colorado probably knows her very well, and I will say she is a very remarkable woman and probably has as good executive ability as anyone in the Indian Bureau. I know that the time of the present incumbent is fully taken up. She is an enthusiast in the office, and her time is fully occupied with the duties of the office. I have been looking for some information as to why this amendment was proposed.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator think it would be possible, without detriment to the public service, to assign this woman to any duty except that which she now has?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not. I know the duties of that office will consume every day of the entire year.

Mr. TELLER. I think so.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not only is the head of the office busy, but numerous clerks are fully employed. There may be some reason for the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood the Commissioner to say at the hearing that frequently it is necessary to send the superintendent to certain schools in cases where all the inspectors or special agents are busy; that she was the proper person to send, being in charge of the schools, and that was the reason why the amendment was put in.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think that would be a proper reason, but under this amendment he could put her to work on an irrigation dam.

Mr. CURTIS. He would hardly do that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The language is so broad, it seems to me there is danger of injuring the school service by putting the superintendent of schools on other work.

Mr. CURTIS. While she would be in general charge of the schools, she might also have to act as superintendent of a particular school, because the superintendent might be removed. Under existing law she could not act as superintendent. Yet, if she was sent out to some school to take charge of it, she ought to have the right to do just as an inspector may now do when he is sent.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes. On the other hand, I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas that this officer might be sent to a school and kept there the year round.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask the Senator from Kansas if the superintendent is not doing such work as he mentions.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the superintendent is.

Mr. WARREN. I think she has been doing that kind of work.

Mr. CURTIS. But there have been cases where she is not authorized under the law to perform certain duties which the Commissioner would like to have her perform while at the school, as I understood him. I may be wrong.

Mr. CLAPP rose.

Mr. CURTIS. The chairman will probably remember better about that than I do.

Mr. CLAPP. It is a matter of very little interest, I think. It does seem to me that when the head of a bureau asks for a matter of that kind, he ought to be regarded as the best judge as to whether it is advisable or whether it is necessary. The amendment is here at the request of the Indian Office. If the Senate prefers to strike it out very well.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I made no motion to strike it out. I simply rose to ask for information.

Mr. CLAPP. The amendment is here because the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has asked for it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Has the Commissioner of Indian Affairs informed the committee why he wants it? That is what I ask for.

Mr. CLAPP. He stated, as the Senator from Kansas has already stated, that it is ofttimes desirable to send the superintendent of schools to examine them when no one else can be sent, and there is a question of authority, and he would like to have it plain, and for that reason the committee put the amendment in the bill.

Mr. TELLER. The Secretary of the Interior can of course order the superintendent of schools to do anything in the line of schools. I doubt whether he can order him to do anything else outside. I do not think he can put the superintendent on irrigation business or anything of that kind. But this provision would authorize that to be done if anybody has the thought of doing it.

I can not conceive why this is wanted. I am confident that the superintendent of Indian schools has now more than any one person ought to do. I do not like to interfere with what appears to be the administration of affairs in the Indian Office, but I think I will venture to oppose this particular amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 13, line 21, after the word "stockmen," to insert "subject only to such examination as to qualifications as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe," so as to read:

To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to employ practical farmers and practical stockmen, subject only to such examination as to qualifications as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, in addition to the agency farmers now employed, at wages not exceeding $75 each per month, to superintend and direct farming and stock raising among such Indians as are making effort for self-support, $125,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 28, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 27, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PROVIDING FOR A TERM OF UNITED STATES CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS AT LANDER, WYO.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4064) to provide for a term of the United States circuit and district courts at Lander, Wyo.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter, and until otherwise provided by law, there shall be held annually on the first Monday in October a term of the circuit and district courts for the district of Wyoming at the town of Lander, in said district.

SEC. 2. That the marshal and clerk of said district shall each, respectively, appoint at least one deputy, to reside in said town of Lander, unless he himself shall reside there, and he shall also maintain an office at that place.

Provided, however, That a place shall be furnished for holding of said courts without any expense to the Government of the United States.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the word "provided," in line 10; all of line 11, page 1, and all of lines 1 and 2, page 2, and insert "Provided, That until a public building is provided on the site now owned by the Government in said town of Lander, a place shall be furnished for the holding of said court at an expense to the Government of the United States not to exceed $300 annually."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Wyoming what he means by appointing a deputy clerk in each locality? What do you mean by holding court without any expense to the United States Government?

Mr. MONDELL. The provision for the holding of a term of court without any expense for rent is modified by the amendment suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—that the expense shall not exceed $300 per annum for a place to hold court.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why do you appoint a deputy clerk in each place?

Mr. MONDELL. In order that there may be a clerk at that point to transact such business as may be required; but no additional expense is involved, because the clerk is paid only in fees.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Can he charge $5 for every day that he serves there?

Mr. MONDELL. He can not.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is that limited and fixed?

Mr. MONDELL. The clerk is paid exclusively by fees, as I understand it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But now he is entitled to a fee if he makes an entry upon his books in the presence of the court. Can this man charge fees when the judge is not there?

Mr. MONDELL. I understand not. I understand it involves no additional expense. On the contrary, the committee which reported it stated that this will amount to a saving of $5,000 per annum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was read the third time and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS MONONGAHELA RIVER BETWEEN BROWNSVILLE AND WEST BROWNSVILLE, PA.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17220).

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17220) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Fayette Bridge Company to construct a bridge over the Monongahela River, Pennsylvania, from a point in the borough of Brownsville, Fayette County, to a point in the borough of West Brownsville, Washington County," approved April 23, 1906.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 7 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the Fayette Bridge Company to construct a bridge over the Monongahela River, Pennsylvania, from a point in the borough of Brownsville, Fayette County, to a point in the borough of West Brownsville, Washington County," approved April 23, 1906, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void unless the construction of said bridge shall be commenced within one year from April 23, 1908, and shall be completed by April 23, 1911."

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the bridge to be constructed under the provisions of said act shall be constructed in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17055) to validate certain acts of the thirty-seventh legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of the thirty-seventh legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act creating four armory boards of control and providing for the construction of armories in the cities of Sante Fe, Roswell, Silver City, and Lascruces," approved March 20, 1907; and an act of the same assembly and session entitled "An act to construct an addition to the present capitol building and for the construction of an executive mansion, and to purchase certain real estate and to provide the necessary means therefor, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1907, and sections 37, 38, and 39 of an act of the same assembly and session entitled "An act providing funds and making appropriations for the fifty-ninth and sixtieth fiscal years, and for other purposes," reported by conference committee, approved March 21, 1907, be, and the same are hereby, approved, and that the bonds therein provided for, whenever issued in compliance with said acts of said legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, shall be valid and binding upon said Territory of New Mexico, as in said acts provided, and that all necessary power and authority is hereby granted said Territory of New Mexico to issue and dispose of said bonds in accordance with the provisions of the said acts.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be in full force and effect from and after its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, from what committee does this bill come?

Mr. HIGGINS. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Territories and meets the approval of the Interior Department.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ASSIGNMENT OF OFFICE ROOMS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the privileged House resolution No. 217 for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rooms in the House Office Building bearing the following temporary numbers, according to the plats accompanying House resolution No. 53, passed by the House December 19, 1907, to wit, 313, 314, and 315, and the large room at the southwest corner of the House Office Building, be, and the same are hereby, assigned for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means, and to the same committee, as an additional room for temporary use, the room on the House floor of the Capitol building, now occupied by the Speaker, and that the rooms now occupied by the Committee on Ways and Means are hereby assigned for the use of the Speaker.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following substitute.

Mr. MANN. I suppose at this time that would be offered simply for information.

Mr. PAYNE. It would be pending, perhaps.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection. Neither the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] nor myself at this time desire to go into consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, at least.

Mr. PAYNE. No.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman offer this for information or as a pending amendment? The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. It may be considered as pending, so that it may be voted upon at the proper time without interfering with the right of debate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That for the present session of Congress the rooms now occupied by the Committee on Ways and Means be assigned for the use of the Speaker, and the room now occupied by the Speaker and such other room in the Capitol as may be available be assigned to the Committee on Ways and Means; that during the interim between the first and second sessions of this Congress the superintendent of the Capitol shall have the files removed from the present file room to some other suitable place in the Capitol, and shall have the file room and the room now occupied by the Committee on Pensions fitted up as committee rooms; that at the beginning of the next session of Congress the rooms now occupied by the Committee on Ways and Means be reassigned to said committee; that the two rooms formerly occupied by the Speaker and now occupied by the Committee on Appropriations at the southwest corner of the Capitol on the House floor be assigned to the use of the Speaker, and the three remaining rooms on the west side of the Capitol, House floor, be assigned to the use of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, while I have not seen the substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York, nor heard it until it was read from the Clerk's desk, the proposition is not a new one to me nor to the special committee. The special committee which was appointed at the beginning of the session of Congress for the purpose of presenting plans for the distribution of the rooms in the Office Building and in the Capitol building has considered a great many different propositions for the purpose of giving to the Speaker more room. I think there is no possible combination of rooms in reference to the Capitol building which our special committee did not carefully consider. The substitute resolution, of course, concedes, as every Member of the House concedes, the absolute necessity in the orderly conduct of the business of the House that the Speaker shall be given better quarters than he now has as the office of the Speaker. So that matter no longer requires discussion. The proposition of the special committee in the resolution is to give to the great Committee on Ways and Means, the ranking committee of the House, which does its work principally at the time when it is making up tariff legislation and having tariff hearings, the finest suite of office rooms, I dare say, in the United States, certainly the finest in the city of Washington—to give to that committee the large room at the southwest corner of the new Office Building on the third floor, which of itself is the finest room in this city of fine rooms, and the best adapted room for the purposes for which the Ways and Means Committee is particularly constituted. We have marked on the plat standing in front of us the four rooms which our committee has proposed to give to the Ways and Means Committee. We propose in addition to that to give to that great committee a room in the Capitol building, for the present the room now occupied by the Speaker, so that the members of that committee may have in the building next to the Hall of the House itself, a room where they may retire and where they may meet their friends.

The proposition offered now by the Committee on Ways and Means is to shift some other committee. Mr. Speaker, I have learned during the time I have been chairman of this special committee that every committee of the House is willing that some other shall be discommoded. My own judgment is, and I wish to express that as the conclusion which I have reached myself, that in the end both the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations will have to leave the two sides of the House, east and west, and then the rooms now occupied by the Committee on Appropriations in the end will be reserved for the use of the Members of the House as the Marble Room is used on the Senate side of the Capitol. [Applause.] I do not believe that because we have erected a great Office Building for the benefit of the Members of the House that therefore we ought to deprive the Members of the House, in the Chamber and in the Capitol, of the privileges which they now enjoy or which they ought to enjoy. The first proposition that was made by the distinguished gentleman from New York to us was that we take off a part of the corridor of the lobby of the House. I protested so far as I was concerned, I never would bring to the House a proposition to take away the privileges which the Members now enjoy, and I think that this proposition is equally bad. Not only is the proposition to shift the Committee on Pensions, but to move the file room and to absolutely cut off any possibility in the future of making that part of the building over for the benefit of Members of the House, and they propose to discommode every Member of the House who has occasion to use the file room.

Not long ago, or when this proposition first came up, I submitted to the Superintendent of the Capitol a proposition in reference to the possibility of moving the file room. He submitted the proposition to the Clerk of the House; and I have the letter of the Clerk of the House in response to that, in which he says that it would be a great error, in his judgment, to discommode the Members of the House by moving the file room of the House off the floor of the House. A few years ago we expended $20,000 in fitting up the file room and the vaults in connection with the file room. The files of this House go down below this floor and they go to the roof of the Capitol. The proposition now is to take the files where? Possibly over to the new Office Building. We have found no place here to put these files where they ought to be outside of the floor of this House. The files are constantly used by the officers of the House; they are constantly called for in the conduct of the business of the House.

Now, I have the greatest regard and respect not only for the great Committee on Ways and Means, but for the members of that committee. If I thought for a moment that we were interfering with the dignity of the committee, I would not offer the proposition I have presented; but I fail to see how it in any way reflects upon the dignity or might of this committee of the House when we give to them not only a room in this building adjoining this Chamber, but give to them, by long odds, the best suite of rooms in the new Office Building.

Mr. Speaker, there have been many times when the gentleman from New York would have been glad to ask us to give him the room now occupied by the Speaker, and I wish to give him an opportunity now which I had hoped before that he would accept with pleasure. He would have dignified the room if he were to occupy it officially as Speaker of the House [applause], and it is no reflection upon him and no reflection upon his committee. After considering this matter without bias, without personal interest, without any inclination to do anything except that which was for the best interest of the membership of the House as a whole, we have reported the resolution now under consideration. We offered to the Ways and Means Committee in the Capitol building almost every other suite of rooms in the building, or were willing to do it, but we could see no place which they would accept; and while they desired that the Speaker should be taken care of, he should be taken care of at the expense of the Committee on Appropriations, at the expense of the House in the moving of the file room, and at the expense of the Committee on Pensions. I have no desire to make any reflection upon the committee. The matter is for the House to determine. Our committee knew that they ought to at least bring the matter in some tangible shape before the House. The Committee on Appropriations, I take it, is prepared and able to defend their own claims and their own interests. In our judgment, it would detract from the benefit of the Committee on Appropriations to shift it to the three rooms, as now proposed—practically three rooms, two of which are separated—and I believe that, without intending the slightest reflection on the committee, if the Ways and Means Committee will go to the new building and during the next session of Congress—if the fall elections should be Republican—will carry on their tariff hearings through the next session, they will leave the halls of Congress and the corridors free from the crowd which otherwise will pour in here, and that after they have occupied those rooms three months nothing will bring them back; and if perchance the country should be so afflicted in the fall elections as to favor the gentlemen upon the other side of the House, and a special session should for any reason be called, then the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] would have the privilege of occupying these rooms as Speaker and let the new Committee on Ways and Means conduct its tariff hearings in this beautiful suite of rooms in the new building, and they never could be brought back into this building. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question on a different phase of this subject. I notice in the resolution which the committee has reported that they give to the Committee on Ways and Means the room now occupied by the Speaker for temporary purposes. I would like to ask the gentleman if his special committee has taken into consideration the possibility of another elevator coming up in the lobby of the House where the Speaker's room now is occupied by the Speaker?

Mr. MANN. The room now occupied as the Speaker's room in the end, I take it, will be used by the House for the purpose of bringing up not only one, but probably two additional elevators, bringing up Members from the subway to the floor of the House, these two elevators to be for the exclusive use of the Members. That would of course take away from the Ways and Means Committee that room.

But if the House should, for a good reason, order the Speaker's room to be used for elevator purposes hereafter, we have guarded against that, and expect to be able to provide without difficulty, on this floor of the House, adjoining this Hall, another room for the use of the Ways and Means Committee without conflict.

Mr. NORRIS. I call the gentleman's attention to it, because I know there has been a good deal of conversation between Members on this side, and there is no doubt that some additional means of gaining admission to the House on the part of the membership will be necessary.

Mr. MANN. Absolutely necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so; and in order that there may be no misunderstanding, I would suggest that the word "temporary" might be modified, so that it would be understood that this ought not to be given to the Ways and Means Committee for a longer period than the end of the session.

Mr. MANN. That is what we would put the word "temporary" in there for. The gentlemen of the House will all understand the difficulty of making a great many shifts of committee rooms when you have no starting point. I think the Members of the House who have dealt with our committee will bear me out in the statement that, outside of the distinguished Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations, which our committee have not been able to move in any way, all of the chairmen of committees who have dealt with our committee—and I think we have dealt with every other chairman in some way—have found out that we have dealt with them in the utmost frankness and fairness.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. MANN. And we have taken care of them as well as possible. Now, if this resolution be adopted in its present form we will be able, before this session is over, to present to the House a proposition which I am sure will meet with the approval of the House, and give to the Ways and Means Committee another room besides the room now occupied by the Speaker on this floor, accessible to the House.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault with the gentleman, but at the same time it seems to me that there ought to be an understanding that this particular room now occupied by the Speaker can not be used by any committee longer than the present session.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman indicate what this room is that he is going to give to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. MANN. I would if I thought it would do the gentleman any good or that it would have any effect.

Mr. DALZELL. I assure the gentleman that it would do me a great deal of good, and I should like to know about it; and I think there are some other gentlemen here who would like to know, who are interested in the question.

Mr. MANN. I will tell the gentleman what he wants to know, for he wants me to say it, and I will be perfectly frank about it. It will be either the room of the Committee on Military Affairs or the room of the Committee on Pensions, and I may say to the House that we are prepared to present to the House, if this resolution goes through, a proposition which will meet the approval of either the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Pensions for a transfer of the rooms. But we can not do that in advance, because we can not carry the plans through unless we know where we start from. It is not proposed to present any plan which will not meet with the full approval of the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Pensions, but I have talked with the members of these committees, and with their chairmen, and I am warranted in making the assertion which I have.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Ways and Means has no fear for the dignity of that committee, for the rank of that committee in the House, and do not think that it depends upon a question whether they have a room here in the Capitol or rooms over toward Long Bridge, as the gentleman has proposed, or whether they have any room at all. So long as that committee is in charge of framing the revenue laws confided to the House by the Constitution, it must and will be the ranking committee of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, because of that fact the committee and the members of the committee must be in touch with the business of the House. During the nine years I have had the honor to be chairman of it no man has ever heard me in this Hall say that by virtue of such chairmanship I was the leader of the majority, and only because it becomes necessary to illustrate this matter do I say so to-day. And because of that fact I have felt it my duty at all times during the sessions of the House to be here in person and be present at all the sessions whenever any business of importance was transacted, or otherwise. I have found it not alone convenient but absolutely necessary to have some room within easy access of this Chamber where I might retire for a moment to talk with the various Members of the House—and that happens every day—where I might go to meet some gentlemen, not Members of the House, but still interested in the legislation of the House, and that happens every day.

I have felt that it was indispensable that this committee should have some room on the floor of the House adjoining the Chamber, not only for the chairman of the committee but for the other members of the committee, the ranking member of the minority, the ranking member next to the chairman in the majority of the committee, who have frequent and daily occasion to use a room adjacent to the Hall of the House.

This proposition came through the newspapers last fall, to my utter astonishment, because I remember that when the first act was passed for the Office Building it was to authorize the Superintendent of the Capitol to prepare plans for a building for offices for Members of the House, not a word being said about committee rooms. An examination of the statutes since has shown me that not only offices but committee rooms were specified in the succeeding appropriation. It is very easy for an appropriation to slip in in an appropriation bill without Members' attention being called to all the purposes of the appropriation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when I came here I met the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who spoke about these magnificent rooms over in the Office Building. I went to look them over to see whether they would be convenient for the work of any committee of this House. The gentleman talks about the most beautiful room in this city of beautiful rooms. Of what practical use is a room 60-odd feet long by 30 feet in width for a committee in this House, a room which has been reported to me by gentlemen who were there during the late hearings before the Agricultural Committee as being a room in which it was very hard to hear what was going on, a room which was spoken of in the Outlook, in an article, as a room in which they could not hear what was being said? I had hoped it would be a good room for committees of the House when they had a large hearing to assemble and conveniently take care of the business of the hearings. I had not dreamed that any such room as that was to be given any committee of nineteen men for the purpose of transacting the business of the committee. The three other rooms are smaller than any committee room in the Capitol; they are neither of them large enough to accommodate the committee meetings, and it would have to meet in the large room, for it would not be convenient for the business of that committee to meet in the small room.

I told the gentleman from Illinois that I did not see how this committee could properly discharge its duty, not alone while forming a tariff but during any year that Congress is in session, because hundreds of bills go to that committee, scores of hearings are had at every session of Congress, and at all times it should be necessary for it to have a convenient room in which its business could be transacted.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the gentleman will allow me, I want to ask how many bills have been reported out of that committee at this session of Congress?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know how many and I do not care how many. There have been many, many bills at every session.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. But I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. PAYNE. I do not care to bother with the gentleman now until after I get through. He can get the floor by and by, when he can score the Speaker of the House or some other gentleman.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is not the issue just now. I will do that when the time is ripe.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] met that question by saying that he would not think of moving this committee without giving them a proper room on the floor of the House. Well, we have this resolution, and we have it after what has occurred in the House with reference to moving the Committee on Military Affairs. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said that his committee had not attempted to force any committee to move over, and he said they would not attempt to force the Committee on Military Affairs to move over, and struck from the resolution all reference to the Committee on Military Affairs. And that corner seemed to be closed for any room to the Committee on Ways and Means. One day, without notice—of course the gentleman was not bound to give notice—he introduced this resolution into the House. What does it provide? Why, he already said to us that he wanted to use the Speaker's present room for an elevator; that it was essential to use it for that purpose, and he provides that we may use it temporarily. He says now he is going to provide a room for us—either that of the Military Affairs or the room of the Pension Committee, on the opposite corner of the House—and now he comes here and says that everyone seems to be willing that any committee should suffer inconvenience except his own. Yet the only committee in the House that has offered to do anything to relieve the Speaker and give him more quarters now is the Committee on Ways and Means, by the proposition which it brings in here to-day offering to surrender those rooms for the balance of the session or until such time as proper rooms can be fixed for the Speaker on the other side of the Chamber. I suggest to the gentleman that the Committee on Appropriations could be accommodated and the Committee on Ways and Means could be accommodated by committee rooms on the floor of the House, adjoining the Chamber. I suggested to him to take possession of the file room and the room of the Committee on Pensions. He is very tender of the Committee on Pensions this morning and says we propose by our substitute to drive them out of the Capitol. Then, almost in the same breath, he says he proposes to give them rooms where they will be better accommodated if this resolution passes, in order that the Ways and Means Committee may have that room over there. I proposed to him to take those two rooms and give them to the Committee on Appropriations and let them keep their present room in the middle of that side of the Chamber, giving them three rooms as large or larger than they have to-day, and that the Speaker take the two rooms from which the Committee on Appropriations would move—rooms, one of which was occupied by the Speaker for years up to the time the office was made for him over here in the corridor; give him those two rooms and let the Committee on Appropriations have those three rooms.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman pardon a suggestion?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. When Mr. Carlisle, as Speaker of the House, was assigned a room next to the elevator he remained there but two years, and absolutely begged to get away from there for these reasons——

Mr. PAYNE. Well, it had been occupied by Speakers for years before that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. He was bound to give it up, and gave it up because of the noise of the elevator.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know how about Mr. Carlisle; but if we give that room over there of the Committee on Ways and Means to the Speaker of the House we may have some other Carlisle who says that he is too close to the elevator, and he will want to move away from that room.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There is no elevator over there.

Mr. PAYNE. Why, there is an elevator there. The gentleman ought to go and look at the location. [Laughter.] The elevator is as near to the door of the room as this is over here. Mr. Speaker, what was the answer to that proposition? Why, the file room could not be changed. We sent for the Superintendent of the Capitol, and he said he could make the changes of the file room and shift them to a room below and fit up those two rooms for committee purposes inside of two weeks. Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] presented a letter from the Clerk, in which he said he would want to make an inventory of all the files before they were moved and that it could not be done during the session of the House. Then we said to them, We will vacate those two rooms there now. Give us a room here in the Capitol or we will go over yonder, even for the rest of this session of Congress, and then after it is over remove the files and fit up those two file rooms and give them to the Committee on Appropriations and to the Speaker of the House. The gentleman says that it is discommoding two committees to do that. What two committees will it discommode? Will it discommode the Committee on Appropriations to shift them to offices over on the same floor to the adjoining Hall of the House? Is that discommoding the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. One of the three 30 feet away.

Mr. PAYNE. He says that it would discommode the Committee on Pensions, and yet he proposes himself to discommode the Committee on Pensions or on Military Affairs by moving them somewhere else.

Why, he has given the Committee on Pensions now an extra room over in the Library; let him give them another room in that vicinity. He can take care of the Committee on Pensions. No, no, gentlemen; the idea of the gentleman from Illinois is that the Committee on Ways and Means shall be subject to all the discomforts arising out of this matter; put it upon them rather than have some other of the committees of the House share the burden. What is our proposition? Give the Speaker those two rooms now. Now, let our committee take that room and another in the Capitol, to be assigned during the remainder of this session; then let the files be removed and those two rooms be fitted up for the Committee on Appropriations, and they will be accommodated. But, he says, the files cost $20,000. Now, the files cost just $12,400. Of course these things grow as years flow by, but, according to the report of the Superintendent of the Capitol, that is what they cost. They can be removed without harm, without injury, without loss, and at very little expense.

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman that may be the report of the Superintendent to him, but that is not the report the Superintendent has made to me.

Mr. PAYNE. It is the report the Superintendent made in 1902, if that was the year he put the files in, to the Congress of the United States. If he has made a subsequent report, I think he should be held to his official report. What is the answer to that proposition? Why is it not fair and just to the Members of the House, and at the same time it gives the Committee on Ways and Means quarters here adjoining the floor of the House in which they may transact their business? We have hearings at every session, and those hearings it is impossible to adjourn at 12 o'clock, and if we are in there having a hearing we could come on the floor at a moment's notice; and if we are over there in the other end of that building, two blocks away, we must adjourn the hearing at least ten minutes before 12 and compel people who come here from a distance to stay over until the House has adjourned or until the next day.

Now, it seems to me, gentlemen, that the Committee on Ways and Means have met this matter fairly. They have never, not one of them, said a word against taking care of the Speaker by giving him two appropriate rooms convenient to him. They offer to incur inconvenience at this session of Congress in order that he may have those rooms at once. It seems to me the House ought to vote the substitute offered by this committee in the disposition of these rooms.

I reserve the balance of my time and yield to the gentleman from Missouri such time as he desires.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I do not have any idea that the Republic will cease to exist, no matter how this question is determined. Still, it is a matter of a good deal of interest to members of the Ways and Means Committee and it is a matter of some importance to the other Members of the House. My friend from Illinois offers me a very tempting bait—that after the 4th of next March, in my capacity as Speaker, I will occupy these rooms now occupied by the Ways and Means Committee. [Applause and laughter.] I used to have a constituent named Nat C. Dryden, a very brilliant man, who was very fond of giving out this dictum, "A bird in the hand is the noblest work of God." [Laughter.] I am the ranking Democratic member on the Committee on Ways and Means, and no matter how the cat jumps at the next election I suppose, as a matter of ordinary courtesy, I would retain that place if the House were Republican; if Democratic, why, "Barkis is willin'" in the matter of the Speakership. [Applause.] The situation about the Speakership is this: There are 391 Members in this House. One of them is Speaker, and not a single one of the other 390 would decline it if offered to him on a silver platter. Now, the Speaker has a small room. In the present exigency in which the presiding officer of this House finds himself he ought to have two. [Laughter and applause.] There are three sorts of people who wait on the Speaker—one set on business, another set on business, and another set just to see the Speaker and shake his hand. That room is not as commodious as it ought to be for the Speaker. I freely admit that. Certainly he ought to have two—perhaps three. I will tell you how I feel about that in connection with the Speakership. The first time that my wife and I ever attended a White House dinner she was assigned to the Peruvian minister to take her out to dinner. She could not talk any Peruvian [laughter] and he could not talk much English, and though she is a very fine talker, the conversation lagged somewhat.

But, sitting on her right was Mr. Secretary of State John Sherman. She had never been introduced to the Secretary, but she recognized him by his pictures. She had frequently told me privately that she intended that if she ever got close enough to him to ask him about the "Crime of '73." [Laughter.] They scraped up an acquaintance, and Secretary Sherman explained to her how the President and his wife were bedeviled with all sorts of people and how unsanitary the conditions of the house were, and that it wore the President and his wife to a frazzle, and endangered their health—even their lives. After drawing as gloomy a picture as he could, he asked her, "Madam, would you be willing to see your husband live in this house four years with all that trouble and danger and under those conditions?" With that good sense which she exhibited when she picked her husband, she said, "Yes; I think I would." [Great laughter.] She said she was willing to take the chances of insanitary conditions and nervous prostration to see her husband in the White House for four years. Well, I would like to see the Speaker have two rooms. I would be perfectly willing to accept the Speakership with one or even without one. [Laughter.]

To be perfectly frank, gentlemen, it is necessary that the Speaker have two rooms. There is no question about that. No difference who he is, he ought to have them. When you go in there to see the Speaker you have to talk in the presence of four or five men, maybe a dozen. It may not be a matter that is strictly confidential, and yet you do not like to have everybody listen to what you say, and he has either to turn them out or talk in their presence. That is the first proposition about it.

When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] first broached this matter to me, to be perfectly frank, and I ought to be, my understanding was that the Ways and Means Committee and the Appropriations Committee, and the two rooms for the Speaker, could not be provided on this floor—all three. I was very much disposed, in order to keep peace all around, to go over yonder into the Office Building. I investigated the situation for myself, and that is always the best way to do about anything, anyhow, if you have the time. I found out that there is no sort of trouble about it on the face of the earth; not a particle. And this substitute provides the only way out of it; and therefore I am in favor of the substitute. It gives the Speaker two rooms over here in the southwest corner, where he was for some time; it moves the Appropriations Committee up a peg, or a room, and gives that committee three good rooms; and I think they ought to have three good rooms. Of course, in order to do that the Pension Committee would have to vacate; but the Pension Committee has one room in the old library part of this building, and I suppose as a matter of ordinary common sense they would rather have the two rooms together.

You can not fix it up on the east side of the Hall of the House because of this opening out here, this big room which is used by the press; and, of course, in hot weather everybody wants those doors open. I think sometimes that the architect who planned this Capitol ought to be dug up and hung, anyhow [laughter], because the Hall of the House and the Senate Chamber both are rooms inside of rooms, and the truth is that each one of them ought to have been a room clear out by itself, so that the sunshine and the air of heaven could come in on all four sides of it. That, however, is not the case. Of course this arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for the room that the Speaker has now for the use of the Ways and Means Committee is purely temporary.

Everybody knows there must be more elevators. I have quit going up and down on this one at all, because it is so much trouble. You have to wait so long. There ought to be an elevator over on the northeast side for visitors and one in the northwest corner for visitors and other people. Then there is another objection to it. My warlike friend from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, which has that room out in the corner, and we could not get it if we wanted to. It will cost some money, of course, to move these files, and it will cost some money to fix those rooms up over yonder in the Office Building. That is the whole situation so far as this floor is concerned. I am not going into a discussion here of the relative rank and dignity of committees.

It is not a matter of rank or dignity. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] stated that correctly. So far as I am individually concerned, if it were as convenient and we could attend to the business of this House as well, I would just as lief be over yonder, if they would give us rooms as good as these, which they could not, because I do not believe they have got as good to give. But here is the truth about it, and we might as well recognize it. There are certain committees of this House which have to work all the time practically. Some of them do not have so much to do. The Committee on Appropriations works incessantly; constantly coming and going here when votes are being taken. It is the same with the Ways and Means Committee, but not so much, perhaps, just now as it is with the Committee on Appropriations. But it is not true that the labors of the Ways and Means Committee are restricted to getting up a general tariff bill, by any manner of means. I will tell my friend from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] the situation about the bills in there. There are a great many bills reported by that committee. No tariff bill has been reported out of the committee, and everybody knows the reason why. There is no use going into that. Our friends on the other side are afraid to let any kind of a tariff bill come in here. They fear some way or another we will precipitate a tariff debate. But there are a whole lot of bills before that committee that are not tariff bills. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and others are reporting bills out of there all the time. I will tell my friend from Missouri that there are seventy-five or one hundred "pop-gun tariff bills" in there, as they used to be called. Every one of those bills has got to be voted on in that committee, and I will see to that myself, with other Democrats of the committee. [Applause.] Of course, the chances are that they will be voted down, but they will have to be voted upon. They will have to be considered. Now, since this matter has come up we have spent two entire meetings, besides about half of another, considering this question as to the rooms. We find that a big room over there that is 90 feet one way and 60 feet another——

A MEMBER. Sixty by 30.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Sixty by 30, as somebody says. That is big enough. The first time we were invited over there by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—there is no more pleasant and accommodating man in Congress than he; he is doing his best to be a peacemaker. He invited us over there one morning. I went over. It was when the Committee on Agriculture was hearing some argument about forestry. There was a big crowd in there; the room was filled when I got there. I happened to get a position about the door, and I could hear every word that was said; but I was in a position where I stood facing the man who was making the speech. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] remarked after we got out into one of these little rooms that the big room was full of echoes. I determined to examine it, but I never heard any more about it until the other day, when we had that great peace conference of over 200 men there, and my friend from St. Louis [Doctor BARTHOLDT] was nominated as the American candidate for the Nobel peace prize. It happened on that occasion that I was seated in the far end of the room, not clear back, but about four seats from the rear, and that room is as full of echoes as any cavern in America is full of bats. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit just a short statement on that subject?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. That room was full of echoes, and always will be full of echoes when it is empty. When we located the Committee on Agriculture there for that forestry hearing, and I went to the room and wanted to see about putting them into it, I told the Superintendent of the Capitol that there never could be a hearing in that room because of the echoes, unless we filled it fairly well with furniture. We put some hangings over in the room and some furniture, and that was absolutely remedied. When the room is fully furnished there will be no echo.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I hope that is true. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. POU. For the information of the gentleman from Missouri, I want to state to him that a gentleman sitting by me says he could not hear one word.

Mr. MANN. I was there myself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not want to detain the House, and I am going simply to restate the reasons why the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] should not prevail.

Everybody recognizes the fact that the Speaker ought to have more rooms. Everybody recognizes the fact that the Ways and Means Committee ought to have a room on the same floor as the House and adjacent to it. Everybody recognizes that the Appropriation Committee ought to be in the same condition, and the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] accomplishes that, and it is the only proposition that can be made that will accomplish it. I repeat the statement that it is not a question of dignity. We are all equal here. It is a question of rendering service to the House and to the country, and it is absolutely ridiculous to expect members of the Appropriation Committee, or members of the Ways and Means Committee either, to stand around here in these corridors and discuss with men propositions that involve thousands and hundreds of thousands and even millions of dollars, with the stream of people going through and shaking hands and speaking to them all the time and interrupting anything they may have to say. Now, gentlemen, a fair deal is a fair deal, and that is all we ask in the premises in this controversy. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to know what time is allowed for debate on this resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has one hour and has used a part of it and reserved the balance of his time. The gentleman from New York has an hour, has used a part of it, and reserved the balance of his time.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. MANN. Of course I am perfectly willing to yield the floor and let the gentleman from Minnesota take the floor in his own right.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am willing to take my time from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. TAWNEY. Five or ten minutes.

Mr. MANN. I will yield for the present ten minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the proposition presented by the gentleman from New York as a substitute for the resolution presented by the special committee is one that concerns the convenience of the House, the convenience of every individual Member of the House, and affects, or would affect, the transaction of the business of this House. It is not because of any personal inconvenience that I may suffer if this is adopted that I am opposed to its adoption.

There is another question which it involves, that is the convenience of the Speaker of the House, whoever he may be, whether the present Speaker or the gentleman from Missouri. One of the three rooms now occupied by the Committee on Appropriations, the south room, up to 1887 was occupied by the Speaker of the House. It was then Speaker Carlisle who occupied that room. The gentleman from Georgia was not entirely correct as to the reason why Speaker Carlisle of necessity abandoned that room. When that room was given to the Speaker there was no elevator at the end of that corridor, and access to the press gallery was not then by the means of that elevator, and it was not as crowded as at present. When the first elevator was constructed, and access to the press gallery obtained thereby to that corridor, representatives of the press then, as now, came to that corridor and called out Members and conversed with them; that also being the only public elevator in that corridor, it was filled by people who were being interviewed by members of the press gallery and people who were attending upon the hearings of the Committee on Appropriations. So that the Speaker, when he came out of that room to the floor of the House, was not only hampered very much in getting along, but everybody that wanted to see him was there for the purpose of waylaying him and detaining him and annoying him, and for that reason Mr. Carlisle of necessity voluntarily gave up that room.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the proposition of the gentleman from New York, I say, involves the convenience of the House, not only in relation to the business of the Committee on Appropriations, but especially in respect to the files of the House. Gentlemen who have no idea of, or who are not familiar with, the use Members make of that file room should go and inquire of the clerks in the file room, and they will be astonished at the number of Members and the number of visits by the same Members to that file room for the purpose of examining the files of the House. So that the proposition to remove the file room without a statement of any information whatever as to where that file room will go, and to what extent the House uses the files in the transaction of its business—to that extent the House is inconvenienced as well as individual Members and the business of the House, as I say, interfered with.

Now, with respect to the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Speaker, it is proposed to give the committee the file room and the room now occupied by the Committee on Pensions; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] says that will give the Committee on Appropriations the same room it now has. To that statement I can not agree.

Mr. HAMILTON. Where is it proposed to move the file room?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no statement as to where. The proposition of the gentleman from New York does not say where the file room is to go, but it will have to go somewhere else, either in the Office Building or in some room other than a room upon this floor. The proposition to give to the Committee on Appropriations the Pension Committee room would not seriously interfere with the work of the Committee on Appropriations were it not for the fact that that room is detached from the other two rooms and necessarily limit the working space of the Committee on Appropriations to two rooms. It would give the chairman of that committee what he does not have now—a private room. That private room would be the committee room now occupied by the Pension Committee; but the working space for the committee would then, if this proposition is adopted, be limited for all practical purposes to two rooms. Now, the files and records of the Committee on Appropriations are, for the convenience of the committee and its subcommittees, necessarily kept in the middle room, and we have now, as you all know, three rooms. The general committee meets in the middle room. The files and records of the committee are kept there because one or the other of the subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations are in session practically all of the time. I have made an examination and I find that on an average the Committee on Appropriations meets once every day during the session, either the full committee or a subcommittee meeting every day on an average—every day in the session, including the holiday recess. During the first session of the last Congress that committee took 3,299 printed pages of testimony in the examination of the estimates submitted to Congress. During that same session that committee wrote 260 pages of the statutes that were enacted. And it is, I say, without any boasting, a committee that in my judgment requires more convenience for the transaction of its business than any other committee in this House. If the Committee on Ways and Means revised the tariff every session of Congress, their work then could be compared with the work of the Committee on Appropriations. I am not making any comparison at all. I have no quarrel with the Committee on Ways and Means. I served on that committee for ten years. I know the importance of the work that it has to do. But I speak of this for the reason that I want the House to understand that the enormous work which the Committee on Appropriations has to do requires all the conveniences that are obtainable, and with two rooms it will be practically impossible to do that work. Some gentlemen will say that it is only eight or ten years since the Committee on Appropriations had two rooms. That is true, but the work of that committee is constantly increasing. The appropriations reported from that committee during the last session of Congress aggregated $482,000,000. Gentlemen know that that committee must of necessity conduct its hearings, and for that purpose the committee rooms we now have are constantly occupied by subcommittees and by those who are waiting to be heard before the subcommittees. During the past two weeks both subcommittee rooms were occupied and there was no space whatever for the people waiting to be heard, except in the main committee room, and when members of the committee went to their rooms for the purpose of writing letters or transacting business with anyone they almost invariably found every seat around the main committee room table occupied and were obliged either to stand up or go out into the corridor, owing to the congestion of business at certain times in that committee. In view of the fact that this room, known as "the Pension Committee room," is so far away, is detached by a distance of some 30 or 40 feet, there would then have to be a main committee room where all of the files would be kept, and the proposition of the gentleman from New York would necessarily limit the working room of the committee to the two rooms, the one we now have and the file room, and that, in my judgment, will not only very seriously interfere with the transaction of the business of that committee, but will also delay the business of the House.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of some of my modest associates on this side I wish to announce, first, for the benefit of Members of that side of the House, that they must not consider that everything in the gift of the Democratic party is already foreclosed, and that perhaps there may be some other gentlemen perfectly willing to occupy the Speaker's quarters when Democrats come to elect a Speaker, although none would grace them better than the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. But I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Members of this House will be more inconvenienced by any action of the House that will impair the efficiency of the work of the Committee on Appropriations and the members of that committee than by anything else that could be done. Members of the House frequently have many matters that they desire to ascertain about and to consult with members of the Committee on Appropriations. The scheme proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has not only been investigated by the special committee, but it has been investigated by all those who have a particular interest in the matter. While I am not in the confidence of the administration of the House, I have no doubt that the Speaker himself must have been consulted, must have considered this matter carefully. If he had a personal preference, I have no doubt that he would prefer to occupy the rooms so long occupied by him as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and yet his long service in this House, most of it as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, must have convinced him that any action that would impair the efficiency of the work of that committee would be a serious disadvantage to the efficiency of the work of the House; and however much his personal preference might be to occupy rooms on that side, I have no doubt that in the interest of the efficient work of the House he has consented to the resolution to occupy the rooms upon the other side of the House. Nothing is of more importance in this matter than the concession made here on the floor by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. Nobody suggests that the Committee on Appropriations could be dislodged during the present session of the House. It would be utterly impossible for the House to transact its business, if that were attempted. Yet the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means admits that if he be given a room for his personal convenience adjacent to the House, and I am convinced that he should have it—whoever is chairman of that committee should have a room adjacent to the House—his committee is willing to remain in the air for the rest of the session. It is apparent the committee will have nothing of real importance to do during the entire session of the House. It is true the committee does have some hearings, it is true the committee will report some bills, but the real work of the committee and the work of greatest importance to the country is in the preparation of the general tariff-revision bills. My information is that when that takes place, the committee does take itself from the rooms now assigned to it to some more secluded place, where they can do their work with comfort and convenience. The suggestion to move the files of the House from where they are at present located and to shift the Committee on Appropriations, so that instead of having three rooms available for its work it will only have two, will result in nothing but disorder and in the impairment of the efficiency of the work of the House. The Members who have had occasion to consult with those associated in the work of the committee, who of necessity are compelled frequently in discharge of their duties to go into the committee for information, not only about bills to be reported or the items in the bill, but about estimates, about what has been done in the past, about what the law is, and about particular items, will realize that if the Committee on Appropriations is disarranged so that its facilities are impaired, the Members of the House themselves will be seriously affected.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my objection to the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is that, in my judgment, he is attempting to move the Committee on Ways and Means out of this House without any necessity whatever for that action. I have served on both the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations since I have been a Member of this House. I think I can say that I know the inside workings of both those committees, and I know that it is of absolute importance that both of these committees should be located close to the Hall of the House. It is just as important that one should be there as the other. Both these committees are committees in the work of which every Member of the House is more or less interested. They should be located where every Member can speedily consult the clerks of the committee. If there was no other way to arrange the proposition so that the Speaker would have two rooms, I should say that one of those committees should move out of this House, because I concede the proposition that it is of the utmost importance that the Speaker of the House should have a retiring room, where people who have business with him could go and consult him without stating that business to everybody who was in the room. But the matter can be arranged. It may inconvenience one or the other. Members of the Committee on Appropriations complain that if the substitute is adopted it will inconvenience them. It can not possibly inconvenience them to the extent that the members of the Ways and Means Committee will be inconvenienced by requiring them to move entirely out of the building. Now, the gentleman from Minnesota says that, giving them rooms located along this gallery where the pension room and file room are located at present, they will have two disconnected rooms. These rooms are disconnected to-day, but there is no difficulty in connecting them. There is a hallway that runs under these marble steps that is used as a retiring room by the Committee on Pensions now and always has been, and all you have to do is to cut a doorway from that hallway into the file room and you have three rooms connected together, just as the three rooms of the Committee on Appropriations are connected to-day, and it is no inconvenience for a man to walk down a broad hallway that is wider than this central aisle now, for 20 feet, in coming to the room. The only inconvenience that can be caused to the Committee on Appropriations by making this move is the question of moving their effects from the corner room down there to the corner room here. If you adopt this substitute, you give the Committee on Appropriations just exactly the accommodations they have now. You do not inconvenience the Committee on Ways and Means, and you give the Speaker of the House exactly what he wants. Now, there is one thing more I want to say, and I know this from experience. The Committee on Appropriations does not need as large a room for its hearings as the Committee on Ways and Means does. Most of the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations are held by a subcommittee composed of five men——

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt my colleague?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. I understand the gentleman to say the Committee on Appropriations does not need as large a room for hearings as the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. This may not be exact, in my opinion, under the stand-pat tariff policy that is now being pursued by the dominant party, but when we have, as I hope and believe we will have in the next Congress, a Democratic majority, and that therefore the Ways and Means Committee will resume its duty and do some business, and that committee at that time will need a large room——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unquestionably it will, for a Democratic majority will enact just, proper, and needful laws.

Mr. CLAYTON. So, with an eye to the future and the public good a Democratic Congress can and will do, and looking to a revitalization of the now defunct Committee on Ways and Means, I hope ample provisions will be made for it. However, I am inclined to support the proposition advanced by my colleague.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank my colleague for his support.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to yield me two minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield the time the gentleman desires.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman the statement I was making at the time of the interruption by my colleague was this, that the Committee on Appropriations does not need as large a room as the Committee on Ways and Means does; that a hearing before the Committee on Appropriations consists of five men, a subcommittee, with the Clerk, and one witness at a time is called——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just let me finish this sentence—that only one witness at a time is called before the Committee on Appropriations. When he goes out, another is called in; but when you have a hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means you have a number of people from all over the country and a large crowd of people coming there who want to hear what the witnesses say.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Wait until I finish my sentence—therefore the largest room adjacent to the House, the largest convenient room that you can use on this floor, is the room that is now occupied by the Committee on Ways and Means. The Speaker does not need as large a room as that, but the Committee on Ways and Means does need it, and it is the only room of that kind you can give them on this floor.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to make this inquiry, if it is not true that when we really get down to doing any business, the Committee on Ways and Means will need a good deal larger room than they have now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we could have them in the Hall of the House, it would be——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have been in the room of the Committee on Ways and Means plenty of times when they were having a hearing and you could hardly get a chance to stand——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is true.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then you ought to go over to the other building, where you can have a larger room. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all; the gentleman might as well say we had better go to New York, or Chicago, or Atlantic City, or somewhere else.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That may be, provided the office building is practically located in New York or Chicago.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We ought to have a larger room than we have if we can get it here, but that is the largest room on this floor, and for the convenience of the committee and for the convenience of the House we ought to be permitted to stay here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, we have now three connecting rooms in which we transact the business sent to the Appropriations Committee from this House. It is proposed to take these three connecting rooms away from the committee and in place of them to give them two connecting rooms and one room, disconnected, a distance, at least, of 30 feet away. That practically, Mr. Speaker, confines the Committee on Appropriations to two small rooms.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have only five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Very well.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And when I get to the end of this sentence I will hear you. No one has suggested, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Appropriations should be moved to this new Office Building, no one in this House would dare make such a proposition. That settles the question of the importance of the Appropriation Committee being near the Hall of the House, where the Members can get access to the committee and where the committee can, on the calling of a roll, come in and vote. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is badly mistaken when he says that we need no room except for five or six witnesses. When we call the War Department or any one of the Departments before the committee, we have got to furnish a room in which they can sit and wait until they are called, one by one, before the subcommittee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They have got a separate room to wait in.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They will not have a separate room to wait in if your proposition be adopted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all, and give you the same space.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The importance of that committee, Mr. Speaker, can be seen by a reference to what they do. During the last session of the last Congress the Committee on Appropriations averaged a meeting every day of that session, either the whole committee or a subcommittee, and during the holidays, when this House was in recess, we were meeting every day. And during that time the committee took 3,994 pages of testimony, and the appropriation list, over which it has jurisdiction and which was represented there and had to be consulted, composed 260 pages of printed matter. That committee at that session sent into this House bills covering $482,980,810.23. That much work has not been done by the Ways and Means Committee in ten years. The Members of this House are constantly consulting the Appropriations Committee because of these facts, namely, that we handle the appropriations for public buildings, river and harbor contract items, Light-House Service, expenses of United States courts, as well as the compensation of the entire civil list of the Government. There is not a day from the beginning to the end of the session when there are not Members running from this Hall into that committee room for information. I am not mindful at this time and do not care where you put the Ways and Means Committee. They deserve good rooms. They deserve all the facilities for transacting their business that we can afford to give them, but why should you disconnect the Appropriations Committee, and, as the chairman told you truthfully a few moments ago, leave us practically only two rooms to do business in? You are able to furnish a place for the Ways and Means Committee, but to do that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] says that we must be displaced and this House inconvenienced from day to day and month to month. Why such logic as that? How can that appeal to the minds of the Members of this House?

I yield back all the time that I have left.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I think it may be well to place before this body the experience of a Member who had some part in the framing of a tariff law, while we are considering whether it be wise to shift the Committee on Ways and Means permanently from this building, although there is a certainty that some kind of a tariff measure will be reported to the next House.

I assume nobody here doubts, whatever may be the outcome of the coming election, that the next House will pass, or at least consider, some kind of a tariff bill. I was concerned in the framing of one, and I venture to say that, while a tariff bill is under consideration, if the Committee on Ways and Means have not a convenient room for meeting close to the House, the majority members will be compelled practically to withdraw themselves from active participation in the business of the House itself.

Perhaps gentlemen do not realize that the Committee on Ways and Means is perhaps the only committee, with the exception of the Committees on Election, where members divide on party lines. Members of course, do not admit they divide on party lines in the Committees on Election. They do not always do it, thank heaven, but very frequently, I may say usually, they do. In the Committee on Ways and Means they always divide on party lines. The most important part of the work which falls to that committee in framing a tariff is performed by the members constituting the majority. They sit almost continuously separate from the other members, and obviously if they must meet at a distance from the House they can not diligently attend its sessions. These majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means are generally important Members of the House. If the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] be adopted these Members must choose between their duties in the committee and their duties in the House. They can not discharge both properly and completely. They can not frame a tariff bill without listening to representations of hundreds and thousands of persons on matters concerning not merely their own prosperity, but the very existence of their industry. And these hearings, conferences, and consultations extend to every single item in a vast number of schedules.

Majority members of the committee can only discharge their duties properly in both places if they be given accommodations contiguous to the floor, so that they can easily come here and vote upon measures as they arise and return to their own room for examination and consideration of those matters so essential, not merely to the welfare of the persons who appear before them, but the entire industrial system of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, contrast for a moment the arguments that are made upon both sides of this question. It is true that the Committee on Ways and Means at this session, when in all probability no important party measure will be reported, are confined to the discharge of routine duties in reference to the revenue; but even in that comparatively narrow department of their duties there are matters of grave importance constantly arising which involve hearings to large bodies of men. The Committee on Appropriations, it is conceded on all sides, must be contiguous to the House. Everybody concedes the Committee on Ways and Means ought to be contiguous to the House. Can these two positions be harmonized? I think they can. I think the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York provides for suitable accommodation for both committees. What is the argument that the Committee on Appropriations advance against the change in their quarters suggested by the gentleman from New York? Simply that they are more comfortably situated in their present rooms.

No one has pretended seriously that efficient transaction of their business would be rendered impossible by removal to the rooms mentioned in the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. The Committee on Ways and Means, represented by its chairman, by the gentleman from Missouri, the ranking Member of the minority, and others with experience gained by service on the committee, know that when it shall be called upon to discharge its most important function it must have rooms contiguous to this body and to the floor of this House if its members are to continue active Members of the House.

The gentleman representing the Committee on Appropriations, its chairman, makes an argument here of convenience, not necessity; and whose convenience? Why, not of the Committee on Appropriations, but the convenience of the Speaker. He tells us that to reach the rooms suggested by the gentleman from New York the Speaker might be forced to mingle with some persons who throng the west end of the Hall, and thus he would probably enjoy stricter isolation if he came and went at this end of the Chamber.

If there be any such risk the Speaker does not complain of it. Indeed, this Speaker, who is admirably described by the gentleman from Missouri as an expanding quantity in the politics and public life of America, has no fear of mixing with anybody. In passing to and from the room that may be assigned to him, I do not think he would have the slightest objection to contact with any American citizen. He is entitled to the privacy the gentleman from Missouri describes when called upon by Members of the House in the ordinary discharge of his duties. That he surely will have inside the doors of the two rooms assigned to him under the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York.

Now, what I want to repeat is this: From all the statements made to this House it is clear that the Committee on Appropriations can do its business, and do it well, in the rooms which will be assigned to them under the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York. The Committee on Ways and Means can not do its business thoroughly over in that Office Building when it comes to the discharge of its most important function if its members undertake at the same time to do their full duty as Members of the House. Between an argument of convenience and the argument of necessity, I assume this House will be governed by the necessities of the situation and that it will adopt the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I must confess my profound astonishment that this substitute amendment should have been offered. What does it involve? It raises an issue, and undoubtedly, as I shall show, that issue is not between the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Ways and Means. If the substitute amendment be adopted, it will result in the moving of the file room and the room of the Committee on Pensions; and if these removals result in great inconvenience to Members, then the issue is between the House and the Committee on Ways and Means. I contend that the real question is whether the convenience of the membership of this House shall be considered and respected, or whether a mere whim upon the part of the Ways and Means Committee is to be gratified. Now, consider the situation. The Ways and Means Committee insists on the removal of the file room, and in addition the removal of the Committee on Pensions. Every Member of this House at some time during the session of Congress makes a visit to the file room, many of them a number of visits. Is not that true?

Mr. DALZELL. I will say to the gentleman that I have not been in the file room in ten years.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I have been a Member of this House for thirteen years and I have never been in the file room.

Mr. BURLESON. I am sorry that gentlemen will make an open confession of the fact that they have neglected their duty as Representatives in such a way. We all know that this file room is an essential adjunct of the House, and its proximity is for the convenience of the membership of this House, and further, that it was in the recent past made fireproof and specially prepared at great expense for our House files. We also know that every Member of this House, first and last, during the session of the Congress, makes frequent visits to the room of the Committee on Pensions. Now, I submit in all candor to the Members of this House, how frequently do you visit the rooms of the Committee on Ways and Means? How often is it necessary for a Member of this House who does not belong to that important committee to go to the rooms of the Committee on Ways and Means? I would not say anything to belittle the dignity or the importance of this great committee; if I attempted to do so, I could not do it. Mr. Speaker, I admit it is an important committee. Sometimes, about once during a decade, and, as at present constituted, from present indications about once in two decades, it will do important work.

I assure you that I would not for the world say anything that would wound the feelings of the membership of this great committee, but looking the situation square in the face, one must admit that except three members of the committee who hold other positions, the membership of the Ways and Means Committee are practically drones. They do practically nothing. I must confess that they do this most gracefully, and not infrequently with great vociferation, and they will do it quite as well if located in the Office Building as from a room contiguous to this Hall. Now, coming down to the proposition, whether you will vote for this substitute or adopt the original proposition offered by the gentleman from Illinois, I have shown that if you consult your own convenience you necessarily must adopt the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] has said that it is absolutely necessary that in the preparation of a tariff bill this great committee should and will be engaged continuously for weeks, in a room contiguous to this Hall. Mr. Speaker, that same argument might be used, and with equal force, in the case of the Rivers and Harbors Committee or the Committee on Agriculture or the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds whilst they are engaged in the preparation of a bill. As a matter of fact, and every man here knows it, the serious work done in the preparation of a tariff bill is not usually done in the rooms of the committee. The Dingley tariff bill was prepared, as we all have been told, in the Cochran Hotel in this city.

Every man here knows that the serious work done in the preparation of the Wilson tariff bill was done in a room set apart for that purpose in the Treasury building; and while I do not vouch for the accuracy of the statement, I have frequently heard it said that the schedules of the McKinley tariff bill were prepared in a hotel in Atlantic City, in the State of New Jersey.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRAN. Was the gentleman a Member of the Fifty-third Congress?

Mr. BURLESON. No; but I know something of the history of that distinguished body.

Mr. COCKRAN. The Committee on Ways and Means had but one room at that time, and there was no place, therefore, where the majority Members could meet apart from the others, and the bill was prepared by the majority. It was only when the Congress was in session and all Members had a right to use the room that the majority were driven to a room in the Treasury Department. While the House was in recess, we occupied the room here all the time.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman confesses that when the House was in session the committee voluntarily went to the Treasury Department, far removed from the House; and yet the burden of the gentleman's argument was that it was absolutely necessary that at all times, especially while preparing a tariff bill, this important committee should occupy rooms contiguous to this Chamber.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman must misapprehend me. I am sure he would not misrepresent me. We had but one room then.

Mr. BURLESON. My time is limited, and I decline to be interrupted by the distinguished gentleman from New York, who, to my mind, is somewhat illogical. [Laughter.] Gentlemen, the question, as I submitted it to you in the beginning, is not an issue between the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Ways and Means. I state to you in all seriousness and candor that it is an issue between yourselves and the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman in charge of the resolution [Mr. MANN] yield for a question for information? There seems to be a conflict of statement by those who are discussing this proposition. Has it been definitely determined that the file rooms will not in the future be moved for any purpose?

Mr. MANN. My colleague, who ordinarily is so extremely lucid, knows that no one can determine what will or will not be done in the future. You might as well ask me when I was going to die.

Mr. BOUTELL. I certainly do not want the gentleman to die; but the chairman of this committee can give no assurance that the file room will not be moved?

Mr. MANN. I can not assure the gentleman what the House will do to-day. I have brought in a resolution which does not contemplate moving the file room, and the gentleman from New York and my colleague from Illinois propose to vote for a proposition which will move them. How can I guarantee what the House will do?

Mr. PAYNE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, if this were a question between the Members of the House and the Ways and Means Committee, the argument of the gentleman from Texas might appeal to the membership. I submit, however, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a question between the members of the committee and the membership of the House. It has already been stated upon the floor of this House this morning, by the gentleman who has presented the resolution, that in time it is expected that the file room will be removed from the space it now occupies and that the Pension Committee will also be moved from that place to some other quarters, so that the convenience of the Members of the House is not to be considered in the retention of the file room and the Pension Committee room.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand that the gentleman in charge of the bill has made the statement that some time in the future the file room will be removed?

Mr. BONYNGE. He said he hoped and expected that the file room would be removed and the Pension Committee moved, so that ultimately we might make out of that space a room similar to the Marble Room in the Senate end.

Mr. MANN. I made the statement that we would have a room contiguous to the floor of the House.

Mr. BONYNGE. But the gentleman said that the file room would be moved somewhere from where it is. The ideal solution of this question is that the Appropriations Committee, the Ways and Means Committee, and the Speaker should all have accommodations in rooms upon the same floor as the Chamber of the House. The Ways and Means Committee, through the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York, has offered the only solution by which that purpose can be accomplished.

Now, I want to say a few words upon a feature of this question that has not been discussed. I am referring now to the work of the Ways and Means Committee when it is not preparing a tariff measure. The chairman of the committee, perhaps, felt some delicacy in referring to his duties as leader of the majority. By virtue of his position as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee he is the leader of the majority upon the floor of this House. It ordinarily has happened also that the ranking member of the minority of the Ways and Means Committee also occupies the position of leader of the minority upon the floor of the House. In the Ways and Means Committee room we have the complete record of all the tariff measures that have been passed, all the Treasury decisions, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS, the Supreme Court decisions, and a library of reference books. The Members of the House will appreciate that very frequently it becomes necessary for the leader of the majority or the leader of the minority to go to this committee room and refer to these reference books in order to come before the House and present to it some data. What are you going to do when you remove our library, with all its reference books, and put them over at the southwest corner of the Office Building? Whenever such a question would arise, it would be necessary for the leader of the majority or the leader of the minority to go all the way over to the far end of the Office Building, away from the House, and before the could get back with the information necessary to be presented to the House the House itself would have gone on to some other business.

The Speaker of the House should have additional accommodations, and the Ways and Means Committee is the only standing committee of the House that has to-day offered a measure by which the Speaker will be given immediately adequate additional accommodations. The substitute offered by the gentleman from New York provides for an additional room to the Appropriations Committee rooms and gives that committee three contiguous rooms, where they will be adjacent to the floor of the House, and I ask that the substitute be supported.

Mr. MANN. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, as to a part of what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] has said, it is not founded in any experience of my own. As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, their room was never anything to me as the minority leader, even while I was senior member of the Democratic side of the Committee on Ways and Means. I have never even kept my coat and hat in there. I regarded it as the office of the majority leader of this House and his Republican colleagues. The House has given to the minority leader another room which he regards as his. Now, as to running in and out of the Ways and Means Committee room to consult this valuable library to which the gentleman from Colorado has referred, I do not suppose any of us have run in and out for that purpose to any alarming extent.

I want to say right now that if there shall be any proposition offered in the future to remove the file room from where it is, I shall vigorously oppose it. It seems to me that the file room, being readily accessible to the House, right at one of its doors, is twenty times of as much importance as any three committee rooms being close to the Hall of the House.

The Speaker of this House ought to have better quarters. He ought to be either in that corner, the southwest, or in this corner, the southeast, I do not care which; but a sufficient objection to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is that it does remove the file room from where it is. I heard a moment ago the interruptions to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], and I stepped into the file room and asked what was the average number of Members who daily called in the file room, where the index clerk is, and where the file clerk is, and where all the files are, and they told me the number runs from forty to fifty daily. Now, then, it is of much more importance for the membership of the House generally to have the file room close to the House than it is to have there either the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Ways and Means. It has been appropriately said this morning when the majority party, whichever party it is, is fixing up a general tariff bill, it does not fix it up in the Ways and Means Committee room. Hearings are had there very frequently, and all that, but the men meet for real action elsewhere. It has become a habit for the majority members to meet by themselves and form a tariff bill and the minority members to meet by themselves and get ready their amendments and their substitutes.

Mr. Speaker, I do not care anything about the quarrel between these two committees. I think that the entire country is going to be amused to-morrow morning when it picks up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or the newspapers and discovers that this little committee fight betwixt Tweedledee and Tweedledum has been going on. One thing is evident to everyone, and that is that the Speaker of this House, the highest in authority and highest in power in this entire Government except one officer, ought to have some rooms more commensurate with the dignity and the duties of his high office. It is an absolute shame that the Speaker of the House should have the little cuddy in the corner there where he is now, and it is necessary and it is right that he should have at least two rooms, and probably more. He has his clerks there—the parliamentary clerk of the House, and all the business of the House has to be transacted there—Members coming all the time to ask for recognition for unanimous consent, party conferences going on all the time, because in a certain sense the Speaker of the House is also the leader of the majority. So it seems to me as between these two contending factions, my vote should be cast upon the side of the report of the committee and against the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], not because the rooms of the Committee on Ways and Means would be any better for the Speaker than the rooms of the Committee on Appropriations, but because the proposition to take the Appropriations Committee rooms for him involves the idea of moving the file room.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I have two or three to whom I desire to yield a short time, and if the gentleman prefers, I will do that first.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; I do. I will reserve my time for the present.

Mr. MANN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee on allotment of committee rooms, I wish to say that this committee has had a very troublesome task in trying to adjust this matter and determine what ought to be done to provide suitable rooms for the Speaker. I can say I am sure that no member of this committee has been entangled in any way in the disputes between these two great committees, Ways and Means and Appropriations, but we have done the very best we could with the opportunities which presented themselves to provide rooms for the Speaker and at the same time arrange for these two committees as well.

Mr. MADDEN. Do I understand the gentleman to think that there is a dispute between these two great committees?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I can not answer that question, because I have not heard all of the debate, but I judge from what has occurred in the last ten minutes that there has been quite a dispute.

Mr. MADDEN. Not at all.

Mr. LLOYD. If there has not been any dispute, I take it that the action of the committee will be indorsed, and there will be no trouble about providing a place for the Speaker. All I have to say is this, that I am anxious that something shall be done, and we have been unable to find anything else that is practical except to provide as we have done in the pending resolution for the Speaker by giving him rooms that are now occupied by the Committee on Ways and Means, and by furnishing the Committee on Ways and Means, in the new Office Building, most excellent quarters. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, as members of the special committee to assign rooms, we do not feel it incumbent upon us to persuade the Members of this House as to matters of convenience to themselves. When we undertook to arrange to place some committees over in the new building in order to afford Members greater convenience here, we were confronted by the fact that the file room was here, and here for all the Members, and had to stay here, and we were confronted by the further fact that we must have the present room of the Speaker to install an additional elevator, and the further fact that the quarters occupied by the Committee on Ways and Means were the most suitable for the use of the Speaker, and that he must have other and better accommodations. We have nothing to do with any fight between the two committees as to the comparative dignity, greatness, and importance of those commitees or their members. I wanted to move both away from here, leaving this floor for the benefit and convenience of Members [applause], but it was made manifest to us that the Committee on Appropriations must necessarily remain in rooms accessible to the House. I withdrew my insistence in that respect for the present and contended myself with agreeing to this resolution in the usual form brought in and adopted by the House in other cases, to move the Committee on Ways and Means to the most suitable apartments conceivable for its use and the most palatial headquarters for a committee that any Member of this House ever saw. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the appearance on the floor of the last two gentlemen emphasizes what I was going to call to the attention of the House. This special committee that proposes to fire the Ways and Means Committee, nolens volens, consists of five members. The report that is now before the House is sustained by three of those members, the two minority members and the gentleman from Illinois. It does not meet the assent of the other two Republican members. Secondly, I find it has been circulated about the House that this proposition offered by the gentleman from Illinois is the Speaker's proposition and that the Speaker is for it, and I have been told by several gentlemen that they are going to stand by the Speaker. Now, I want to say something about that. I want to say that the Speaker has said from the very beginning of this controversy that he was willing to stay, so far as he was personally concerned, just where he was; that the only thing that he had in mind was the convenience of the Members of the House; that so far as the rooms to which it was proposed to move him were concerned he had absolutely declined on every occasion to every person to express any opinion. Now, then, so much being cleared out of the way, what is this proposition?

Mr. LANDIS. Does the gentleman mean to leave the impression with the membership of this House that the Speaker is entirely satisfied with his present quarters?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, not at all. The Speaker has said so far as he is concerned he is willing to stay in his present quarters. Nobody wants him to do that——

Mr. LANDIS. But the gentleman recognizes the embarrassment under which the Speaker rests in the midst of this discussion. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Undoubtedly, and all this declamation about wanting to take care of the Speaker is just so much declamation for the reason there are no two opinions on the subject. There is no one who does not assent to the proposition that the Speaker must be taken care of. There is nothing involved in either of these propositions that does not look to the taking care of the Speaker. Now, there are three parties who are interested in being kept on the same floor as the Chamber of the House.

It is necessary, it is important that those three parties should be kept on this same floor. Now, the question is, Can they be kept on the floor without doing unreasonable inconvenience to any of them? At first it was suggested that the Committee on Appropriations could be moved over to the three rooms adjoining the Chamber on this end, and two rooms on the corner be given to the Speaker and that the file room be removed. The answer made to that proposition was that the file room could not be removed while the House was in session. Very well, then, the Committee on Ways and Means assented and said that they would let the Speaker have the room of the Committee on Ways and Means during this session, and that they would temporarily occupy the room now occupied by the Speaker, and let the present situation, so far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, continue during the remainder of this session. After the session adjourns, then let the file room be removed, let those three rooms at this end of the Capitol be fitted up as committee rooms to be occupied by the Committee on Appropriations and the two rooms at the other end, which are equally advantageous, so far as the Speaker is concerned, as the two rooms at this end, be assigned to the Speaker. Now, to my mind, there is no answer to that proposition except this, that gentlemen object to the removing of the files. Well, I do not know whether I have been derelict in my duty as a Member of the House or not, but I have been a Member of this House for twenty years and I have not been in the file room on business six times during all that time. I may not, perhaps, be so diligent in my business as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], but that is my experience. The Superintendent of the Capitol came before the Committee on Ways and Means and said that the files could be removed and the rooms prepared as committee rooms in fifteen days; that he could find in this Capitol a suitable place for the files, and the whole work could be done during the vacation. Now, then, accepting that situation, you have the Committee on Ways and Means taken care of, you have the Speaker taken care of in two of the best rooms on this floor, you have the Committee on Appropriations taken care of with as much space as they have now. So far as the little hallway connecting the file room with the room now occupied by the Pension Committee is concerned that, to my judgment, is an advantage, because it gives an additional space in which a typewriter can be put, and it gives also a private room at that end of the Capitol.

Now, then, why ask the Committee on Ways and Means to go way over to that Office Building? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] says that except when we are making a tariff bill the Committee on Ways and Means have nothing to do. Why, Mr. Speaker, the most important legislation on the statute books of this last ten years came from the Committee on Ways and Means. From that committee came the Porto Rican tariff bill, a bill involving great constitutional questions; from that committee came the Philippine tariff bill; from that committee came the war-revenue bill; from that committee came the repeal of the war-revenue bill; from that committee came—and the rooms were filled while we were considering the question—the bill making denatured alcohol free of tax. Cuban reciprocity occupied the attention of that committee during two entire Congresses, and yet we are told that the Committee on Ways and Means does nothing except when it is making a tariff bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, we want nothing in this matter but justice. We want a fair deal. We want to accommodate all these three parties on the floor of the House, where they ought to be, and the question is not which one of the three parties we shall pick up and fire, nolens volens, over into the Office Building, but how we can accommodate all of them right here, where they ought to be.

It is objected that the file room ought not to be moved. In one breath the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] tells us that we ought not to remove the file room, and in the next breath he tells us that the time is coming, and not far distant, when the file room will be removed and we will have a marble room on that side of the Capitol.

Now, about the rooms over in the Office Building. Why, you might just as well send a committee of this House into the chamber of this House itself as to send them over to that proposed room to do any business. Think of putting nineteen men, sitting at a table, in that tremendous big room, that runs clear from the third floor to the roof of the Office Building. It is ridiculous to talk about—simply absurd. If we are going to be sent over to the Office Building, you will have to provide some other quarters for us. Those are of no practical importance.

I end as I began—we want justice, and that is all. We want a square deal. We want to stay where we are entitled to stay and where the Committee on Ways and Means has been from time immemorial. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to discuss some propositions which for lack of time I shall not touch upon. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] said that the proposal of the Ways and Means Committee was to give the Committee on Appropriations three contiguous rooms. I do not know what constitute "contiguous rooms" according to his understanding. It gives the Committee on Appropriations two rooms, and a third room between 30 and 40 feet away, separated from these two rooms by the great marble staircase going up to the gallery, and with no means of communication except a narrow hallway running under the stairway.

I want, in this connection, to pay a feeble tribute to a humble servant of this House. For more than thirty years Mr. Courts has been acting as assistant clerk or clerk of the Committee on Appropriations—a Democrat, I believe, in politics—and yet so invaluable are his services that he remains as clerk of that committee whatever party may be in the majority in this House. [Applause.] Frequently two subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations are meeting in different rooms, divided by the main room of that committee. This invaluable man is passing back and forth from one subcommittee to the other constantly, aiding all of us. To attempt to set apart to us two rooms separated from our third room by 30 or 40 feet of corridor is largely to destroy the usefulness of this invaluable man to the committee and the House and greatly impair the convenience of discharging the work of the Appropriations Committee.

Now, if I had time I would discuss the fact that the rooms proposed to be given to the Speaker by the committee are much larger than the rooms proposed to be given him under the Ways and Means Committee proposition. I would discuss the difference between the situation at the two ends of this corridor, the one used by the public and the other used for Members and their families under the order of the Speaker, but having so little time I have seen fit to present the necessity for quarters for the Appropriations Committee, where the services of this clerk of that committee may be utilized by the two subcommittees that are so often required to be in session at the same time.

I yield back any remaining time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of great embarrassment to me to bring this proposition before the House. When I offered the resolution in the House at the beginning of this session for the appointment of a special committee to assign these rooms, I understood that it had been settled that the Committee on Ways and Means was ready and willing to move.

We went on with the work. Our committee has met sometimes praise; usually the other thing. The abuse which the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Pennsylvania thrust at me to-day is not new. Every committee wanted more than could be given it. Members of the House desired to have better rooms than could be given to each one. When we presented the proposition for the distribution of rooms to the Members, many Members protested; and yet when it was all over everybody was satisfied that the arrangement was the best that could possibly have been brought into the House. Now, we are not proposing—and I hope the House will understand that—we are not proposing to give to the Committee on Ways and Means poorer quarters than they have now. Our proposition is to give to the Speaker better quarters than he now has, and to give to the Committee on Ways and Means better and more ample quarters than they now have, and leave the Committee on Appropriations where it is. Their proposition is to give to the Speaker poorer quarters than we propose, to give to the Committee on Appropriations poorer quarters than we propose, and to keep to themselves, without yielding a thing, the present inadequate quarters which they have. The gentleman from Pennsylvania talks about the room over there being too large—how can nineteen men fill the room? But he forgets who the nineteen are! [Great laughter and applause.] The room over there is twice the size of the room in here; only twice the size of the room in here; but every Member of the House who has ever attended a meeting of the Committee on Ways and Means of any importance knows that this room is too small and inadequate for the learned gentlemen who sit around the table there and the great number of people that come to be heard. Aye, more; when the next tariff bill is to be made, and men from all over the country come here to be heard, if the Committee on Ways and Means occupies that room, that corridor will be filled, not with Members of the House, not with people calling on Members of the House, but filled with people from all over the country, waiting in the corridor as an anteroom to the Committee on Ways and Means. We offer to the committee a proper committee room, a proper anteroom, a proper clerk's room, and a private room for the chairman in the new building, and a room contiguous to the Hall of this House in this building. More could not properly be asked; more could not be given. Our proposition was reached without bias. I have no sympathy in any personal envies and jealousies of the members of the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Ways and Means. The sole object of our committee has been to bring in a resolution which would best take care of the interests of the House now and in the future.

I move the previous question on the resolution and substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question on the resolution and upon the substitute.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The vote will be taken on the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DALZELL. Division!

The House divided, and there were—ayes 62, noes 151.

So the substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17288, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

The CHAIRMAN. There was pending last night at the time when the committee rose a point of order reserved by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the point of order was simply reserved.

Mr. Chairman, at the adjournment last night the point of order was reserved on the first paragraph in the bill, increasing the pay of the enlisted force of the Army. I want for a minute to call attention to what the increased pay will be for a company of infantry. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] very properly called attention to some large increases, and referred to some of the enlisted force being increased as much as 100 per cent. I stated, I think, while he was speaking, that there were none of the enlisted force increased as much as 100 per cent. I find there was an increase of 100 per cent in one class especially that we specially provided for, and that was the musicians, and with the large increase we also provided that they should not be permitted to compete with civilian bands, so that it would deprive the band of one means of increasing the amount paid them by the Government, as the law stands to-day. We also increased cooks 100 per cent. I did not at the time have these two classes in mind. The amount of increase of totals I find, after investigating the matter, is not as great as even I thought it would be. I have received since Congress convened to-day from the Department a carefully prepared table, which I want to put in the RECORD here, especially on that proposition.

It is a table showing the comparative cost of a company of infantry during the civil war, the Spanish-American war, and under the proposed increase before the House. A first sergeant during the civil war received $24; during the Spanish war $30, because he had the increased pay of 20 per cent in time of war. The present proposed flat rate is $45 to begin with.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HAY. Does he not get the increase of 20 per cent if he serves in the Philippines?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; both under present and proposed laws if he serves in the Philippines; but what I wanted to refer to specially in this was the very proper warning of my friend from Virginia as to the enormous cost in time of war of a large volunteer army that would naturally be called into the service. That is the purpose I have in showing that that large volunteer army would not receive a large increase of pay for its enlisted force unless the war should continue for more than three years, because the volunteers would come in under the flat pay which is proposed by our increase. The amount of pay that is given here for these different grades will be increased under this law if they should remain in the service for additional periods of enlistment. There is no controversy between my friend and myself on this matter, and I am not now using this in any criticism of what was said, but believe that it should be given to the House for the information of all of us.

The quartermaster-sergeant in the civil war received $20; in the Spanish war $21.60. The present proposed pay is $30, and so on down the list. But the total is what I want to get at, without taking up the time of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. There is an increase in the pay of the private soldier?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. A private in the civil war received $16 after the first two years of the war; in the Spanish war he got $15.60 on the first enlistment, because he got the additional 20 per cent pay by reason of service in time of war. The present rate of pay is $15, with an increase for reenlistment of $3 for the first two enlistments and $1 for each subsequent reenlistment up to the seventh.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the time of the first enlistment?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Three years.

Mr. NORRIS. A man would have to serve three years before he would get the benefit of the increase?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; before he would get the benefit of the $3 increase.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that true of the officers also?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The officers have to serve five years before they get any increase. Now, the total number in a company on a war footing is 125 men. The cost for one month of a company in the civil war was $2,106. The cost in the Spanish war was $2,079, and the cost under this bill will be $2,151, not a very large increase.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have not seen these figures, and I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, is he considering the $2 additional pay that we are giving in this bill?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And it only makes that slight difference in the cost?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Only makes that slight difference in the total cost of a company.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Assuming original enlistment for all?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly; the flat first enlistment period.

Mr. MANN. What was the difference——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The cost of a company in the civil war was $2,106; in the Spanish war, $2,079.60, and under the proposed rate, $2,151 for a company of infantry for one month.

Mr. MANN. That is for a full company?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; for a full company.

Mr. HAY. The general per cent of increase is 35 per cent, is it not?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think about that.

Mr. HAY. And the whole enlisted force when they first go in receive the flat pay under the provision contained in this bill?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HAY. What I am trying to get at, as the years go on and these men remain in the Army, the pay necessarily increases under the provisions in the bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Absolutely. The gentleman is entirely correct on that; but the point I had in mind when this table was handed me was the flat first enlistment pay. And I confess I thought the gentleman was entirely correct in making his statement yesterday. If I had made any statement on the subject I would have made exactly the same statement, that there would be an enormous increase in the pay of the large volunteer army in case of war. I understood the statement of the gentleman to be that the cost would be so enormous that it was a question whether the Government could stand it. Am I right about that?

Mr. HAY. Would not an increase of 35 per cent, with an army of 500,000 men be an enormous increase?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, yes.

Mr. HAY. That is not an excessive number to put in an army in a time of war.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will read through all these increases, and the gentleman will see that the tables are correct.

Mr. HAY. That may be. But we have had a great many tables and every one of them differs from the other one. Nobody can tell exactly what they are giving as the cost. I know that we appropriate every year for the Army on the present basis $10,000,000 for enlisted men, and 35 per cent of that is $3,500,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. In time of war the whole 20 per cent is to be taken off if this measure shall become a law, and we now appropriate for less than the number provided for by law.

Mr. HAY. That provision is not repealed.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is if the provisions we put in are carried through. That is absolutely taken off.

Mr. HAY. You do not repeal the 20 per cent for foreign service?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No.

Mr. HAY. For foreign service in the Philippines?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; but that 20 per cent would add to this, just as it does to present law.

Mr. HAY. So in time of war if they served in the Philippines they would get the 20 per cent?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes, unless Congress took some other action.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Very well.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to have the gentleman state to the House how much the increase is over what the soldiers are getting now.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman means for privates?

Mr. BOOHER. No; take the whole company—the officers and all.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We do not increase the number. The gentleman means increase of pay?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We increase the orderly sergeant from $24 to $45.

Mr. BOOHER. Has the gentleman got it compiled so as to show what the increased pay would be for the whole company?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have not got the total cost for the whole company at the present rates; it is a question of addition. I can not give the difference for a company. I can only give the pay of privates and each grade of noncommissioned officers.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if it is not impossible to answer the gentleman's question? He wants to know what the actual increase in dollars and cents would be for a company. Now, it would depend entirely on the length of service of the members of the company and the number you had in the company.

Mr. BOOHER. I want to know what the cost would be—what the advance provided for in this bill would be for a company of 100 men?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There are 128 enlisted men in a full company. In the civil war it cost $2,106 a month.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman does not get at what I want. I want to know what pay a company of 128 men would get now and what it would be under the increases provided for in this bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It would be at the present time $2,079.60 less 20 per cent; but you don't take the 20 per cent off the larger amount, but add the 20 per cent to what they already get under the flat rate to make the $2,079. I am not mathematician enough to figure that out on the floor and give anyone a definite answer, nor do I regard it as material.

Mr. BOOHER. I supposed that the committee had figured the increase up by the month.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is figured on the increased pay in time of war under the present law and the proposed law.

Mr. BOOHER. I had rather have it in time of peace if we could get it.

Mr. HAY. What would be the cost for a company of infantry in time of war? What does the table show it to be under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The table shows that a company of infantry in time of war, with the present laws on the statute book, would cost $2,079.60.

Mr. HAY. For what time?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. For one month; and for a company of infantry under the proposed law it will cost $2,151.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the gentleman who made the tables, that is practically impossible, because under the present law—take, for example, the pay of an orderly-sergeant, who gets $25.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, in time of war he gets $30.

Mr. HAY. In time of war he gets $30. Under the proposed bill he gets $55.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; $45, because we cut off that 20 per cent.

Mr. HAY. If he served any length of time he gets more than the $45.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I concede that; there is no controversy on the effect of length of service. I am talking about the flat first pay. That is what a volunteer army in time of war would mean.

Mr. HAY. Then that is $15 a month more for each man.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; under this bill he would get $15 per month. But with 20 per cent added to present pay he would get $15.60 per month.

Mr. HAY. Every other noncommissioned officer in that company gets an increase of pay under the proposed provisions of this bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HAY. And every private gets an increase of pay.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; he does not. The private does not get as much.

Mr. HAY. Why, he gets more—or you mean the 20 per cent?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes. A private in the Spanish war on his first enlistment, with the provision for war, got $15.60, and under this law he would get $15.

Mr. HAY. Noncommissioned officers all get more.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes, but they are not so large in proportion when you come to warfare.

Mr. HAY. It all depends on where they serve. If they serve in the Philippines they would get 20 per cent.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; under the old law or proposed law.

Mr. HAY. And the probability is they would serve there or some place outside of this country.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I doubt that very much.

Mr. HAY. I know we would have some there.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If the gentleman will read this table he will see that the Department has got in the exact figures at what we fix: First sergeant, $45; quartermaster's sergeant, $30; sergeant, $30.

Mr. HAY. How many sergeants?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Six. It makes $180 for six. Corporals, $21, make $210, ten corporals. Cooks, $30—increased to $60. There we have made an increase of 100 per cent.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think the Department persuaded us that the cook was the most important part of the Army.

Mr. HAY. Yes; and I think that is very probable in some respects.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Musicians, $15, two of them, $30. That is not the band. Artificers, $15, only one; privates, $15; so that the total adds up $2,150, while in the Spanish war the rate was: First sergeant, $30; quartermaster's sergeant, $21.60; sergeant, $21.60, making $129 for six.

Mr. HAY. I do not want to know what the Spanish war rate is, but what the rate now is.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The rate now would be what I first read, on the flat first enlistment.

Mr. SULZER. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to say that if this proposed amendment should become a law the enlisted men would get more pay during war time than during time of peace?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No.

Mr. SULZER. Exactly. That is what I understand.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If this law be enacted, the whole provision as we have given it, we shall have cut out the 20 per cent in time of war.

Mr. SULZER. That is what I understood; and I understand that the exact amount of increase of pay for the enlisted men will be about 30 per cent. It will average up to about that at the end of the enlistment, and I do not think it too much.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], or any member of the committee, if he can inform the House as to the difference between the pay of a company in time of peace under the current law and under the proposed law? The comparison thus far has been in time of war, but what concerns me more especially at this time is to know the difference in the cost per company under the current law and under this proposed legislation.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. In time of peace the percentage of increase would show much larger than these tables show. I think I have tried to explain that—that in time of peace we would have to deduct from this Spanish war the 20 per cent.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why is it the committee, in preparing this proposition, coming to the House with it at a time of profound peace, did not figure on the difference in cost under existing conditions and under the proposed law, so that the House could understand what it is asked to do?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I tried very hard to state that this table was prepared to meet the statement as to enormous cost in time of war.

Mr. TAWNEY. No member of the committee knows just how much we are increasing the Army.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I tried to state that the other day very completely. On a full Army we have about a $4,000,000 increase for the enlisted force. I stated that fully.

Mr. TAWNEY. But you have not as to the company organization.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; you can divide that by the companies. What I assumed would be wanted would be total cost.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, I want to ask the gentleman another question——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You do not go by companies when you make appropriations; you appropriate for the entire enlisted force of the Army.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman has said that this increase for enlisted men—first enlistment—was from thirteen to fifteen dollars——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will you state to the House what the Government furnishes in addition to the $15 to the man?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. And can you state what the money value is?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is it?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You furnish him his clothing, you furnish him his food, you furnish him his medical attendance, you furnish him his quarters. I think it was estimated, in round numbers, that the entire allowance for the enlisted man was fairly worth about $17 a month. Is that right, Mr. YOUNG?

Mr. YOUNG. Seventeen dollars and seventy-three cents.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is that on the basis of thirteen or fifteen?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Allowances are not changed. Under the current law it is $17.73 a month, under proposed law it will be the same.

Mr. HAY. That is, plus the $13.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, that is important; one Member says it is $17 plus the $13.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly it is plus; one is pay, the other is allowance.

Mr. SLAYDEN. There is evidently a misunderstanding. The enlisted man, under the current law, receives $13 a month; he has an allowance of $56 and some odd cents a year for clothing——

Mr. YOUNG. A hundred and fifty-five dollars for three years.

Mr. SLAYDEN. All of his clothing is charged to him. If he consumes less than the amount allowed him in the three years' enlistment the difference in the cost of what he actually consumes and what he had a right to take under that allowance is paid him in cash at the expiration of his enlistment. I believe the practice now is to settle each six months.

Mr. TAWNEY. As I understand it, under the current law, an enlisted man under his first enlistment is receiving at the rate of $30.73 a month, including allowances.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is right in one sense, but not in cash. This does not change the allowance at all. The allowance for clothing and furnishing rations, medical attendance, etc., remains the same as under the present law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman a computation for the other noncommissioned officers and their allowance?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The allowances are all on the basis of an enlisted man.

Mr. STAFFORD. No greater?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No greater and no less. The allowances are for the grade of an enlisted man. I think for a sergeant there is a little allowance for his chevrons; that is all, I think. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to state the whole matter is subject to the point of order, but I am glad it is withheld so it may be discussed by anyone who desires to do so. I desire to call attention to this fact, because it seems to me to be important, and to say to this House that the Committee on Military Affairs, I think, believe, without any dissenting opinion, that there should be an increase of pay of the enlisted force; that the condition of the Army demonstrates that unless something is done we are liable not to have an army, and that our responsibility to the country demands that we present to the House at least some measure of this character. If the House desires to amend it, if the point of order is not insisted upon, of course, it is open to amendment, but some measure of this character should be passed upon by Congress in the interest of the public safety, and having done that the responsibility no longer rests with the Committee on Military Affairs but with the membership of this House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman and the committee think that an increase of $2 a month, $24 a year, would be sufficient, in view of the wages that are paid throughout the country, to draw a sufficient number of men into the service to make up for the depleted ranks?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will yield to Mr. Young to answer that, and I will supplement his statement if necessary.

Mr. YOUNG. It would undoubtedly not be enough, if that was all there was to it. We have not any great difficulty in first enlistments. The trouble is in keeping the men who have enlisted once in the Army for a second and third enlistment.

So we increase the pay on the second enlistment from $15 to $18, and on that enlistment we give a bonus of three months' pay. We pay thirteen months for twelve. Also, we have increased the allowance for marksmanship to $2, $3, and $5 per month, according to the degree of expertness. Very few soldiers reach the highest degree of expertness which entitles them to the $5 a month. More than half reach the lowest degree. Some 20 per cent, I think it is, reach the second degree; but only about 3 per cent the highest degree. We find, however, that the very greatest trouble in recruiting the Army is that the noncommissioned officers go out at the end of their first enlistment. The first sergeant, the orderly sergeant, as we used to call him, and who is the father of the company in a sense, is looked up to by all the men, and if he will not reenlist the company will not reenlist. If the first sergeant finds an inducement to keep him in the ranks, then the company follows generally, and we have held out these prizes in the noncommissioned grades which every private can reach. That is the inducement, and not the pay, for the first enlistment. It is what the private has ahead of him that induces him to stay; and the committee, which has considered that question very carefully, and has had the best advice it could get from the military officers, believes it has amply met the situation, and that this bill if passed will fill our Army and keep it full.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman has undoubtedly made an exact statement of the facts concerning that. Every private looks forward to the time when he will be a corporal and then a sergeant. Now, as the law stands to-day, the best class of privates will not accept the appointment as corporal and work on up to the sergeantcy, because he can make more on extra-duty pay than the difference, and he has not the responsibility of the company on his shoulders.

Mr. MADDEN. Under this bill that you have reported you increase the compensation of the men 15 per cent over current law for the first three years of enlistment. Is that correct?

Mr. YOUNG. It is $2 a month.

Mr. MADDEN. That is practically 15 per cent. Then, if they reenlist for the next three years, you increase that 20 per cent?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You give them $18 for the second enlistment and $21 for the third enlistment.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, do we understand that in addition to these figures you pay them $5 a month for marksmanship?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not unless they qualify. We have a law now that gives each private that is a marksman $1 a month extra, and if he is a sharpshooter we give him $2 a month extra, and if he is an expert sharpshooter we give him $3 a month extra. That is the present law. We have increased that so as to give the lower grade $2, the next one $3, and the next one $5, so we will give an inducement to everyone who can to qualify as expert sharpshooters.

Mr. MADDEN. How much is the maximum pay that a private can receive if he continues in the Army?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If he continues to serve in the Army to the period the law now provides for retirement, he would receive $30 per month if he became an expert sharpshooter. That would give $25 pay, with increase for reenlistments and $5 for being an expert sharpshooter.

Mr. MADDEN. What proportion of the men who enlist become expert marksmen?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. But very few expert, but a good many become marksmen. More become marksmen than become expert sharpshooters. It gets fewer and fewer as you go up, because the requirements of the higher grades are so very strict that only the very best quality of them can qualify in them.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Not more than eight or nine to the company become expert sharpshooters.

Mr. MADDEN. So there is only a small per cent of the enlistment that is capable of receiving the highest pay?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not think it is that many for the highest pay.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] a question, but I will make my statement now first. The gentleman knows that Tennessee has always been a great soldier-producing State. In my district a great many soldiers are enlisted for the Army and Navy. This will always be the case in Tennessee, judging the future by the past.

I have received a great many complaints about the lack of proper pay, it seems to me, from the very highest officer to the very humblest private, and it is a matter of a great deal of concern to their parents and friends, and of course ought to be to me, and is. Now, will the gentleman tell me briefly the main cause of these general complaints?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Why, they are paid much too little, especially the noncommissioned officer. I will say that from the information I have had from those who have enlisted, and some leading Members on that side of the House have information from their own families confirming that information, that in the first enlistment the pay cuts but little ice, but in the reenlistment—and in the efficiency of the Army it plays a very important part in maintaining one—unless the pay is increased from the privates up to the highest noncommissioned officer, we will have very great difficulty in maintaining our Army.

Now, the gentleman has admitted—of course you have thoroughly investigated the matter—that this pay is too small. Now, how much have you increased, by this bill, the pay; what per cent?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We have increased it a different per cent for the different officers, until the average increase in money is over 30 per cent.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am not so much interested for increasing the officers, who can care for themselves, as I am for increasing the pay of the privates.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This bill does not deal with commissioned officers. The gentleman must understand that there is a noncommissioned officer, who comes up from the ranks and is necessary for the company. He is always an enlisted man.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How about the private; let us hear about him?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The private gets $15 a month under this bill, and he gets $13 a month under the present law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much is that raised?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We raised it $2 a month on the first enlistment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, just a few words more. As I understand from the people of my district, they are much concerned about this, and I am satisfied it is the same in other districts over the country. The board of trade in Nashville, composed of several thousand leading business men—men filling high office, professors and college men, and merchants and preachers, doctors and lawyers—has passed a resolution upon this subject. They seem to have given a good deal of attention to it, and, with the permission of the committee, I would like to have read the resolution which is sent to me by Mr. Shannon.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will you not be satisfied to print it in the RECORD?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want you to hear it read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

Mr. TAWNEY. Suppose every other Member of the House should bring in resolutions that come to him from chambers of commerce and have them read before the House; the whole time of the House would be occupied.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is not the case now. This is right on the point. I usually file these resolutions, as the practice is, but this is a matter that I am not as fully informed on as I want to be, and possibly there are other Members in the same fix, and therefore I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., February 22, 1908.

Hon. J. W. GAINES, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the last meeting of our board of directors the inclosed resolution was presented by the Hon. T. W. Wrenne. After some discussion the board went on record as indorsing this resolution, and, as secretary, I was instructed to forward copy to you.

Yours, truly,

E. S. SHANNON, Secretary.

[Copy.]

The pay of officers and enlisted men at this time of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Revenue-Cutter Service is wholly inadequate for the services rendered, and so small that it is impossible for the Government to maintain the regulation quota, and the number of officers and men necessary for the duties to be performed and required of the Army and Navy. The pay allowed officers and men is much less than that allowed generally in all other lines of occupation and employment. The pay has not been advanced at all in the proportion that the necessary cost of living has increased in the last several years. This fact is known to the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, and all the officers and men comprising the Army and Navy, and has been considered by the President and the Departments mentioned, and in the conference held by the President, the Acting Secretary of the Navy, and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, the latter Departments having charge of these matters. A bill has been prepared and offered in Congress, where it is now pending, providing for such an increase in the pay of the officers and men as would be fair and just, and such that men now in the service will remain, and fixing the pay on a basis that will encourage the enlistment of men in the Army and Navy, thus enabling the Government to maintain the necessary quota of officers and men in service.

In view of these conditions and facts, the board of trade of Nashville favors the measure now pending, and desires its prompt passage by Congress, and approval by the President.

Resolved, therefore, by the board of trade of Nashville, That it hereby gives its indorsement to said measure, and recommends and requests the Senators and Representatives in the Congress from Tennessee to vote for and aid in the passage of said bill pending as aforesaid, and which has been prepared and recommended for passage by the President and Departments as stated.

Resolved, further, That the secretary of this board forward copies of this resolution to the Senators and Representatives referred to.

NASHVILLE, TENN., February 21, 1908.

Mr. E. S. SHANNON, Secretary, City.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your favor of 19th instant, I am pleased to hand you herewith a copy of the resolution relating to the bill pending before Congress, to increase the pay of the officers and enlisted men in the Army and Navy, Marine Corps, and Revenue-Cutter Service, which resolution, you will remember, was adopted at the last meeting of the board of trade. The Banner issued the day after the meeting published the text of the resolution, and should you, in communicating the action of the board to the Senators and Representatives of Tennessee in Congress, decide to forward copies of the resolution to each it may facilitate your work to forward copies of that issue of the Banner. I know that the officers and men in the service will appreciate this action of the board and the steps you take to communicate the resolution to the representatives refered to.

Thanking you for your attention to the matter, I am,

Very truly, yours,

T. W. WRENNE.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, before I yield the floor I would like to ask the gentleman this: Have we any law allowing Congress to appropriate money to find or locate, properly mark, and protect the graves of soldiers who were killed in battle while in the service of the United States?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is a law we have enacted since the Spanish war, bringing deceased soldiers to be buried at home. Congress has absolute power any time it pleases to pass any law it might desire or appropriate the money for laying out the graves and marking them properly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is a law now.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. To locate and properly mark?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. To locate and properly mark and to protect.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I know of no such statute.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the committee, so that I may make a rather sad statement. For the past three or four months I have been endeavoring in every way, through our very obliging Secretary of War and his splendid machinery, to locate the graves of soldiers that fell in the battle in or about New Orleans in December, 1814, and January, 1815, and to my amazement, to my astonishment, and I will say to my sorrow, I was informed by General Aleshire yesterday in a letter that is printed in the RECORD of yesterday that the graves of these soldiers, except possibly two, can not be found. They are not marked, and yet, Mr. Chairman, the great battle of New Orleans, wrought by these and other soldiers, was more remarkable than perhaps any battle that was ever fought upon American soil.

I, of course, and many other Members with whom I talked about it privately, very naturally inferred that those killed were properly cared for, that their graves in the cemeteries were properly marked. Yet, gentlemen, I believe only two of the graves of the soldiers of that great battle have been properly marked or cared for. That is neither the wish nor the disposition of the American Congress, nor is it the desire of the proud and patriotic people of the United States.

Mr. CAULFIELD. How many were killed in that battle?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will look in the RECORD of yesterday on his desk, he will find that not many were killed, but it was the heroism of those who were not killed and those who were killed that swept their foes off the face of the earth and gained this far-reaching and greatest victory.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Inasmuch as this has nothing to do with the bill under consideration, although I do not want to raise the point of order, I hope the gentleman will not take up too much time. The subject is not before Congress now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to have it before Congress.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I should like to get on with this one proposition that is before us, if possible.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the chairman will indulge me for a few moments, I will not take up much time. I ask two or three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman will find in the RECORD of yesterday a statement of the number killed. On the 8th of January there were 6. Here is the total loss there: Total killed, 5,575; total wounded, 185; total missing, 93; total 333. On the 8th of January there were 6 killed and 13 wounded. Some that were not killed outright died soon from their wounds. But, gentlemen, their graves are not marked; their graves are unknown. Yet when the news reached the city of Washington that Jackson had gained that great victory the mayor of this town issued a proclamation and asked the people to illumine their homes, and it was done.

The Daily National Intelligencer, of Washington, Monday, February 6, 1815, in part reads thus:

ALMOST INCREDIBLE VICTORY!—FROM NEW ORLEANS.

Dates up to the 13th of January—the enemy attacking our entrenched Army on the 8th, beaten and repulsed by Jackson and his brave associates, with great slaughter.

Then follows a copy of a letter from Major-General Jackson to the Secretary of War, dated "Camp, 4 miles below Orleans, January 9, 1815."

On the same page this is found:

THE ILLUMINATION.

On the full confirmation of the above particulars of the glorious affair at New Orleans, a general illumination took place in this city on Saturday evening, in pursuance of the following recommendation by the mayor:

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas it has pleased the Almighty Disposer of events to signalize our arms, under the command of the gallant General Jackson, at Orleans, by a victory over the invading foe, unparalleled in the annals of nations; and

Whereas it becomes a people relying on the favor of heaven for support to rejoice in every manifestation of divine goodness, and a number of the citizens of this corporation having expressed to me a wish to celebrate our brilliant triumph by an illumination of this city, in which I most heartily accord, I do, therefore, hereby recommend to the citizens of this corporation to illuminate their houses this evening at 7 o'clock, and to continue until 10 o'clock. And I do enjoin upon all the officers of police to be vigilant in preserving order and preventing mischief.

General Jackson, in his official account of the above glorious battle, states the killed left on the field, 700; wounded, left on the field, 1,400; prisoners, 500; total, 2,600. Our loss, only 7 killed and 6 wounded.

Given under my hand at the city of Washington this 4th day of February, 1815.

JAMES H. BLAKE, Mayor.

The people here did not believe Jackson could win that victory. They thought he was an Indian fighter, and not the great military chieftain that he was, the great chieftain that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] alluded to a few days ago. He took his untrained troops, he himself not being a West Pointer nor a man educated in military tactics in any school, but he won that great victory. Congress was then in session, almost quaking in its shoes, almost shivering with fear that that battle would prove a great disaster to American arms. It was freely talked of on the streets of this city, if not here in Congress, that the American Army would be utterly routed and ruined. But instead of that the news came which settled it forever that although Englishmen may come here and haul away our millionaire girls and sweethearts they can never haul down the American flag. [Applause.]

It is said, Mr. Chairman, that the foreigner may come here whenever he pleases, but not as he pleases. He may come here when he pleases, but since the battle of New Orleans he leaves his men-of-war and his sword behind.

Mr. LAMB. The Almighty fought on Jackson's side.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; God Almighty was on his side. And, Mr. Chairman, I think at this late day my friend will agree that there should be some reference made to the subject here, to show that we not only respect what these great heroes did, but that we shall honor ourselves by honoring their graves. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the House is naturally interested to know exactly what is paid under this bill and under the present law, in each grade. It is a little more complicated question than it seems. For instance, at the present time a soldier gets $13 a month when he first enlists. Under the new bill he would get $15. On his first reenlistment under the present law he would get $3 increase, and the same under the new law. Thus, under the second enlistment the soldier would get under the present law $16, and under the new law $18, making $2 difference. On the second reenlistment or the third enlistment the present law increases his pay $2; the proposed law increases it $3, so that the result would be $18 and $21, or a difference of $3. On the fourth enlistment both laws increase it by $1, making a difference still of $3, between $19 and $22. On the fifth enlistment there is no increase by the present law which, after the third, seems to increase by $1 every two enlistments; the result being that on the seventh enlistment by the proposed law he would get $25 instead of $20, or $5 difference; while on the tenth enlistment the increase is going on under the present law, and not under the proposed law, so that the difference again would be only $3—$22 under the present law and $25 under the proposed law. Now, I have a table here——

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman from New Jersey will pardon me, would not the soldier every time he reenlisted under the proposed law get three months' pay, which would be $45 for each reenlistment?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. A little more, perhaps. I will come to that. He gets three months' pay at the last rate. I have prepared a table which shows an abstract of the full effect of the bill from beginning to end. I have only stated these details in order to show the House how difficult it is to construct an exact average, and that we can only say generally that in the matter of privates in the Army, who are mostly in the first, second, or third enlistment, the difference between the two provisions is only $2 or $3 per man per month, so far as the ordinary pay is concerned.

Now, as to the other officers and noncommissioned officers, the difference is shown in the table, but it is far greater. We did not think it right that the first sergeant should remain at $24 a month, and we have made his pay $45; but the increases after that are not much, if at all, larger under the bill than under the present law. This bill attempts to give an opportunity for merit. It intends to give a good, fair pay, not so much as is given for the Navy for like officers, but a pretty fair pay. The $45 pay grows to $55 a month, besides the ordinary allowances, which, in the case of a first sergeant in camp, generally includes quarters for his wife—he stays with the company, but he has a place for his wife and children.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] has pointed out, quite rightly, that in all these cases, after the first enlistment, we give thirteen months' pay instead of twelve. That is to say, at the reenlistment there is a bounty of three months' pay, because it is so important to get hold of the man just at the time he thinks "I will go out of the Army." He goes home; he looks about; he makes up his mind, and says: "Well, I might perhaps go back," and the offer of three months' pay will bring back your sergeant and your corporal or your trained expert or the rifleman who gets the extra $5 per month. Now, this matter of sharpshooting is the most important thing there is in our Army.

I think it can hardly be said of any other nation in the world, but it can be said of us, that we have an army of marksmen. We try not to keep a man who can not become an ordinary markesman—that is, a man who can really hit the target instead of firing at it and missing it. Sharpshooters are different. I have had some experience and know. In companies of 70 to 100 men it is not ordinary to get more than 10 sharpshooters, and it is not ordinary to get more than 3 or 4 expert riflemen. An expert rifleman is one who can make a skirmish run, and in the heat of the run throw himself down on the ground and make a bullseye—that is, hit the silhouettes that are placed in that skirmish run. That kind of a man is an extraordinary man. It is worth while to keep him in the Army for $5 a month more.

The benefit of this bill, as will be noticed, is not a very great increased pay to the privates. It is the view of the Chief of Staff that it is for the benefit of the Army that those who do not become officers should go into civil life, and that we should have a whole army of discharged men throughout this whole country who are ready to join the ranks in time of war; and we depend for recruiting our Army, not upon the high pay that we give to the privates, but because they are young and ambitious men, who love the uniform and love the work and who know that if they join the Army there is a chance not only of a commission but also to get a position as a noncommissioned officer which will amount to something and which will give him a permanent place where he is well paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I ask unanimous consent to print as a part of my remarks this table.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] a question in regard to this provision. As I understood his statement, this increase of pay would amount in the aggregate to over $4,000,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. About $4,000,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not also a fact that the pressure for increasing the compensation of the officers of the Army is even stronger, and that there is an organized effort in that direction much greater than there has been to increase the pay of the enlisted men.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, there has been, of course, an effort to increase the pay of the officers, and I think in a sense it is a proper question to be discussed.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not questioning that, but what I want to ask is this: In case the increase would be allowed to the officers, then what would be the aggregate of that increase—the proposed increase?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There has been nothing proposed in this bill at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand that.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. So that I can not answer that question. It is all under the control of Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Iowa will perhaps tell us what the probable increase would be if the proposition for an increase of pay to the officers should prevail.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I should say, if the proposed increase, or what is called the "Warren bill" that is now before the Senate as an independent measure, were to prevail, it would mean between $2,500,000 and $3,000,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is the officers?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Then the question of increase would also be determined somewhat by whether that provision would apply to those on the retired list. If it did not, you would reduce it by $250,000. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], in regard to this great push for an increase in the pay of the officers, that the Secretary of War in his hearing before us said that above all things that were necessary was the increase in the pay of the enlisted men; that while it was only just to consider the other and make it if we could, yet if only one could be made, the enlisted men should first be taken care of. That is the testimony of the Secretary of War and also of the Chief of Staff, substantially.

I want to say to my friend that there has been a tentative talk among the members of the committee of an increase which would commence with the brigadier-general and give him $500 a year additional salary, which would make his pay the same as the pay of a rear-admiral of the junior grade in the Navy. That officer of the Navy gets $6,000 a year, while our brigadier-general, of equal rank, gets $5,500. Then there is a proposition to give a flat increase of $500 a year for each grade from brigadier-general down to and including the second lieutenant, which would make an increase of about $2,000,000 for pay of officers, a less increase than proposed by the other plan, of giving the larger increase to the upper grade of officers and less than $500 to the first and second lieutenants. Another thing, a percentage increase would further discriminate against infantry line officers by giving mounted officers a still larger increase than would be given officers not mounted. In my judgment the difference in pay is now too great.

That is a matter that should be taken up if the measure is brought before us and fully debated and discussed. The proposition here is simply to increase the pay of the enlisted force of the Army.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman in charge of the bill illustrate more forcibly than anything I can say as to my purpose in reserving the point of order on this paragraph. It is evident that before this session of Congress adjourns there will be a struggle between the two Houses over this proposition to increase the pay of the officers of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more. I took up too much of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] None is heard.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have no objection to the proposition to increase the pay of the enlisted men, but I do object to legislation authorizing this increase of pay being carried on an appropriation bill, and the mistake we make if this provision remains in this bill is that we are transgressing the rules of the House in doing it. When this proposition goes to the other legislative branch of the Government they will feel justified in incorporating in the bill their proposition in regard to increasing the officers' pay as an amendment to our unauthorized provision. This I do not believe the House or the Committee on Military Affairs is in favor of; so that at the end of the session the House will be confronted with the proposition—either increase the salary of the officers, as proposed by the Senate, as an amendment to our proposition to increase the pay of the enlisted men, or you will get no appropriation for the support of the Army.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think that that proposition will be made in any event, whether this goes in or stays out?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think that proposition will be made in any event, but the proposition ought to come on a legislative bill, which the House should send to the Senate for the purpose of authorizing this proposed increase in the pay of the enlisted men of the Army. We can send this bill to the Senate as a separate proposition immediately after the passage of the appropriation bill, if necessary. If this proposition is to go into this bill, either by unanimous consent or by a special rule, we can as well pass it as an independent proposition. The Committee on Military Affairs has legislative jurisdiction as well as appropriating jurisdiction. There is no reason why this proposition should not come before the House as all other legislation comes from legislative committees and be considered as a separate proposition. In that case it would be considered on its merits, uninfluenced by the fact that it was a part of the bill appropriating money for the support of the Army. If we send to the Senate a clean appropriation bill and their proposition is put on there, under the rule that obtains in conference they will have to recede. Their body will be the one that will have to recede, but if we send this appropriation bill to the Senate with a provision for the increase of pay of the enlisted men, in violation of the rules of this House, and they amend our proposition by increasing the pay of the officers, then it will be a question of endurance between the two houses or no appropriation for the support of the Army.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman a question right there. That is one of the points; the committee believed it was better to put it on here, and we could control it better than we could if it was in a separate and independent measure. Is it not always the rule that the House making the amendment, if the other House will not agree to it, must recede?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it depends upon——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is the rule.

Mr. TAWNEY. If it is an amendment to an appropriation; but that rule does not obtain if it is an amendment to legislation.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I never heard of its being limited before——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman believe, if this increase should remain on the appropriation bill and the Senate should add an amendment to this proposition increasing the pay of Army officers, it being an amendment by itself, the House would be able to protect itself against that matter in conference, whereas if it goes to the Senate as an independent bill it will result in a compromise in conference inevitably?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, it will result, in my judgment, if it goes to the Senate in this appropriation bill, in the House being compelled in the last moments of the session to recede from our disagreement to their amendment increasing the salary of the officers of the Army or not making any appropriation for the support of the Army.

Mr. MANN. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time, of course——

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, the gentleman from Illinois knows that this proposition goes in here in violation of the rules of both Houses, and if we are the first to transgress the rules of our House, that will be the excuse on the part of the other branch for transgressing their rules by amending legislation on an appropriation bill sent to them, and our position will be less advantageous than it will be if the contest between the two Houses on the question of increasing the officers' pay comes on a legislative bill.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the gentleman knows so far as this being a violation of the rules is concerned that it is subject to the point of order, and he also knows that there has not been an appropriation bill passed in this House for thirty years that did not have a provision in it that was subject to the point of order when it went out of the House.

Now, what we are seeking to get here is the strategic advantage, whatever that may be.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what I am after.

Mr. MANN. If the gentlemen who will be the members of the conference committee and members of the Military Committee of this House are prepared—I do not know that they are—to say to the House that they will not yield to the Senate amendment, is not that absolute protection to the House and does it not avoid the possibility?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. That would protect the House against any chance of being forced into the position in the closing twenty-four hours of the session to recede or have an extra session of Congress. Of course we know now that within the next two or three months there will be many threats on both sides of the Capitol that "We will stay in this body until the other place freezes over before we give in;" and yet they always adjourn at the regulation time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the members of the Committee on Military Affairs who will be the conferees on this bill ought to be asked to say that they will not do thus or so in conference, because a conference, if it is not a free conference, is no conference at all, and I think that it is not even advisable to instruct in advance or ask them to commit themselves positively one way or another on any proposition.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield on that?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, of course, has had a great deal more experience on appropriation bills than I have, yet I have been watching them pretty closely for some years——

Mr. TAWNEY. We all concede that.

Mr. MANN. If you go into the Senate with this as a bill by itself, you can not go in and instruct the conferees that they will not yield, because that is not a free and full conference, but it is no violation of that rule to instruct the conferees that they shall stand absolutely against the Senate amendment as to one amendment in the appropriation bill of the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois made a remark that I want to call attention to. He referred to the fact that every appropriation bill passed by the House when passed contains provisions that are there in violation of the rules of the House. That criticism is always indulged in by committees that have legislative and appropriating jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said items that were subject to a point of order. It is the gentleman who said it was in violation of the rules of the House. The rules of the House allow the provisions unless a point of order is made.

Mr. TAWNEY. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, these provisions that the gentleman refers to—legislation carried in other appropriation bills—is legislation in respect to the administration of public expenditures, either in the way of a limitation or restriction, calculated either to reduce or safeguard public expenditure. This is an entirely new proposition, and believing, as I do, that if it remains in this bill and goes to the Senate, it means ultimately the increase of the salaries of the officers of the Army, I shall for that reason insist upon the point of order. But I will withhold it for the moment.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman says that this is different legislation from that which one generally finds in appropriation bills. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not on all fours with the proposition to increase the salaries of clerks in the different Departments that frequently appear in appropriation bills brought from the gentleman's own committee?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not at all. This is on a par with a proposition brought from the Committee on Appropriations to increase the salaries of all the clerks. To propose to increase the salaries of one or two clerks in a Department, simply because of increased service or something of that kind, is an entirely different proposition. The Committee on Appropriations has no other means of informing the House as to the necessity of increasing salaries in particular cases. Not so with the Committee on Military Affairs. It has legislative jurisdiction over all matters pertaining to the Army and can consider and report bills relating to the pay of the Army or in relation to anything else connected with the Army that, in the judgment of the committee, the needs of the service require.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is a pity that the entire membership of the House could not have been here this afternoon and have heard or participated in this discussion of the pay of the Army. It is a very important measure, important by itself and important in its relation to other branches of the public service. And I am going to ask the committee to bear with me for a few minutes while I call attention to certain features of the pay of the Army and of the Navy. My colleague on the committee [Mr. PARKER] has, I presume, inserted or provided for insertion in the RECORD to-morrow morning of certain of the data to which I shall refer. The average monthly pay of the enlisted men of the Army, according to the disbursements of the Paymaster-General last year, was $17.33. Now, this $17.33 included all such extra pay as arises from allowance for skill as marksmen, sharpshooters, and expert riflemen. Plus that, I may say, is to be taken into consideration the clothing allowance, which was mentioned a while ago, $169 in three years, or $56.33 for one year. We take no consideration of the value of food, of medical attention, of the housing provided for the soldier, fuel and light, the cost of medical service, and all that sort of thing, all of which is of material value, all of which, if counted up in the total, finally costs a great deal, and which I am prepared to admit will show there was paid to the soldiers in consideration of their services more than $30 a month.

I want particularly to have the attention of the committee to the consideration of the relative pay of the two services. I am not arguing that one is too low and the other is too high. I simply want you to take knowledge of the facts and to consider them, because within a very few days you will be called upon to vote upon the pay of enlisted men in another branch of the military service of the country, which, man for man, costs about twice as much as the Army. We must be just to both. Last year the Navy pay averaged for the enlisted personnel $30 per man per month. Now, plus this $30, each enlisted man in the Navy received an outright contribution at the time of enlistment of $60 for clothing allowance. He enlisted for four years as against the three years' enlistment of the soldier. After this first allowance of $60 the seaman pays for his own clothing out of his pay. That has already been brought out here. The seaman also receives a bonus for reenlistment of three or four months' pay.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Four months' pay.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He receives a bonus of four months' pay, the chairman says, at the rate paid him for the rank that he held at the time of his discharge; and there are enlisted men in the Navy who are drawing very considerable salaries. This bonus runs up to two, three, and even four hundred dollars.

If a man's enlistment expires to-day and he reenlists to-morrow, he will get that bonus, in some instances amounting to several hundred dollars. If he is discharged to-day and does not reenlist until the day before the expiration of the period beyond which this bonus, whatever it is, does not go, he will get it. The man may go out and stay on a vacation for four months less one day and receive it on the day of his reenlistment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the estimate for the pay of the Navy for the ensuing year has been increased by 10 per cent. The seamen of the Navy of the United States will receive an allowance of $33 per month for the next fiscal year; and, curiously enough, and it is a fact which does not seem to be generally known by the Members of this House, it is within the province of the President of the United States, within the limits of the appropriation, to fix the pay of the Navy at whatever he pleases; and he, acting upon the advice of the officials of the Navy Department, has decided that for the next fiscal year the seamen shall receive this 10 per cent increase, or $33 per month.

The suggestion was made in what is known as the "Dick-Capron bill" that we pass a law vesting the same power in the President, to fix the pay of the Army within the limitations of the appropriation. But it met with no sympathy in the committee, and I am quite certian it would not meet with any on this floor. And I believe that if the statutes did not now confer upon the President of the United States authority to fix the pay of the Navy, you could not muster a corporal's guard in this House for giving him any such power as that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may have five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask my friend from Texas one question. How did he ever get that power?

Mr. SLAYDEN. The power was given to him about 1814; I am informed it was done during the period of the second war between England and the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And he increases the pay as much as he pleases?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, no; within the limits of the appropriation, of course.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, then, when the House makes the appropriation, why, they take into consideration the fact that he can do that thing.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I presume so. I do not think the majority of the membership of this House has known it until very recently. I confess I did not know it until a few months ago. I did not know that he had any such power as that, and I was shocked to learn it. The estimates are made in the Navy Department, and, after consultation with the officials of that Department, I presume, the President fixes what pay the seamen shall receive for the next year, being restrained only by the limit of the appropriation and his own view of what is right.

Now, it so happens that he has decided that they shall have an increase of pay of 10 per cent for the ensuing year, and it is to be fixed at $33 per month, provided, of course, Congress does not choose to exercise its authority and change the law or reduce the amount of the appropriation, so that it will not be possible to do so.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does his estimate include warrant officers?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it does. I did not make up the figures myself. They were given to me, but I thought of it afterwards, and I do not believe that they do include the pay of warrant officers. There is a considerable increase of pay to be added to the average cost of enlisted men in the Navy if the warrant officers are figured separately.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What is a warrant officer?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Warrant officers are boatswains, gunners, and other noncommissioned officers.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They stand just between the enlisted force and the commissioned force. They are quasi enlisted and quasi commissioned.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They are highly paid seamen.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They get from $1,300 a year to $1,800 a year.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They get as high as $2,100, I am told.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I knew that they went up as high as $1,800.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They get very large pay, although they are not commissioned.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is useless at this time to invite this House to consider a comparison of the treatment of the two branches of the service. There are not enough Members present here, even if I could command the attention of all of them, to make an impression upon them that would be felt in the House itself. But if they will look at the pay rolls of the two branches of the service, if they will see the sort of appropriations that we are making year after year for the support and upbuilding of the Navy, and compare it with what has been done and is being done for the Army, I think Members will reach the conclusion that although there may be extravagance in this branch of the military service, there unquestionably is extravagance in the other.

In the Senate a bill is now pending that proposes a flat increase of 40 per cent of the pay of the enlisted men of the Navy and a 20 per cent increase of the pay of the officers. You have already been invited to consider the fact that the officers of the Navy are better paid, rank for rank, than the officers of the Army. Yet, despite that fact, there is pending with prospect of passage a bill (S. 3335) which not only provides for a flat increase of 40 per cent in the pay of the enlisted men of the Navy, but will make a more glaring disparity between the pay of the officers in the two services. My colleague on the committee, Mr. PARKER, has just called my attention to the fact that the figures that I thought he would have in the RECORD to-morrow, and which show the comparative pay of the Army and Navy, were printed in the RECORD of Tuesday. They show very clearly that the pay of the Navy is too high or that of the Army too low. I commend his tables to the attention of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LOUDENSLAGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 102. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish three condemned cannon to the mayor of the city of Detroit, Mich., to be placed on the base of a statue of the late Maj. Gen. Alexander Macomb, United States Army; and

H. J. Res. 120. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to apply the unexpended balance of the donation made by the citizens of Dallas, Tex., under the provisions of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905, to work in construction of Lock and Dam No. 2, in section 1, of Trinity River.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2872) to amend an act to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 40.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey of Contentnea (Moccasin) River, in the State of North Carolina, from the town of Snow Hill in Greene County, to the town of Stantonburg, in Wilson County, for the purpose of estimating the probable cost of dredging and removing obstructions from the said river.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I want to take advantage of this time, the first opportunity I have had, to correct now one of the many inaccuracies, inconsistencies, and glaring misstatements made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] in his campaign speech yesterday. On some future occasion I hope to take up a little more of the time of the House in refuting to a greater extent some of his misstatements; but to-day I shall content myself by refuting this one misstatement in the gentleman's speech on page 2626 of the RECORD of yesterday, February 26. I send the paragraph to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Virginia Democratic Association, at a meeting in this city in October last, voiced it in a preamble and resolution which were published in the Washington Post. I will read as follows:

"Whereas William Jennings Bryan, the great commoner, as well as the great uncommoner; the great advocate of free silver; the great advocate of government ownership of railroads; the great advocate of initiative and referendum; the greatest blower upon earth; the greatest standing candidate upon earth; the greatest man without a record known in American politics, is threatening again to become a candidate of the Democratic party for the President of the United States: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this association that he stands about as much show of success as a short-tailed bull in fly time."

Mr. SULZER. Now, Mr. Chairman, from a careful reading of the speech there can be no doubt that the intention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was to clearly convey the impression to this House, and to the people of the country generally, that this preamble and resolution had been adopted or agreed to by the Virginia Democratic Association at a meeting held in this city last fall. I have in my hand a sworn statement made by a gentleman of this city, who is very well known, who was formerly the president of the Virginia Democratic Association, is now a member of that association, and who was present at this meeting, which tells the truth in this matter. I send this statement to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read, so that it will positively refute the impression, if any there be, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania doubtless intended to give out to the country, and I want it to receive as prominent a place in the RECORD as that misstatement of fact has received. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
February 27, 1908.

Hon. WILLIAM SULZER,
The Capitol.

DEAR SIR: In justice to truth, Mr. Bryan, and the Virginia Democratic Association, I would like to have Mr. DALZELL's statement that our association is against Mr. Bryan corrected; and that it may be as widely published as his speech will be, I make the following statement, under oath, for you to make use of, if you will:

The resolution referred to by Mr. DALZELL was offered at the September meeting, held in the Riggs House, by Maj. R. C. Glascock. The president called for a second to the motion, but as there was no one present who entertained the views therein expressed, except Mr. Glascock, it failed to receive a second, and was not before the meeting or any part of its proceedings. The Virginia Democratic Association has entertained Mr. Bryan on a number of occasions, and it is the expressed opinion of all its members heard from, with the one exception, that Mr. Bryan, in point of ability, knowledge of governmental affairs, and honest patriotism, has no equal to-day among public men.

The papers dominated by those large moneyed interests which have been exploiting the people, with the approval of the Republican party, have been filled with unfair attacks and misrepresentation of Mr. Bryan.

He is the people's candidate and for the people's interest, whether they are Republicans, Democrats, or members of the new Labor Party, and will be so recognized next November.

I would like to see such statements corrected. As a member and ex-president of the association present at the September meeting I subscribe to the above facts as true.

Very truly, yours,
R. E. L. YELLOTT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 27th day of February, 1908.
[SEAL.] MARY E. BRANSON,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, that statement speaks for itself. I have not the time, and I do not intend now to take up the valuable time of the committee to reply, to any great extent, to the political speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], delivered on the floor of this House yesterday. As I said, that was a campaign speech, made for party purposes, filled with political inaccuracies, historical inconsistencies, and material misstatements so far as Mr. Bryan is concerned, so far as the Democratic party is concerned, and especially so far as the Virginia Democratic Association is concerned. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The House heard the speech yesterday, and the part I especially object to is now effectually refuted and absolutely denied. That is all there is to that, and there is nothing to it at all. I am informed by those in Washington who know Mr. Glascock that he is a crank. At this meeting of the Virginia Democratic Association last September he offered this so-called "preamble and resolution," and he could not get a second to it, and the resolution was not acted upon at all, but was withdrawn, or whistled down the wind, and that was the end of it.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if that sort of political material is to be used in the coming campaign by the Republican party, I think at least that the country ought to know how absolutely untrue and unfair and unjust it all is to Mr. Bryan and to the Democratic party; but in my judgment that kind of campaign misrepresentation will not hurt Mr. Bryan or injure the Democratic party. No doubt—and I do not want to do the gentleman from Pennsylvania an injustice—he wanted it to go to the country that the Virginia Democratic Association had voiced, or agreed to this preamble and resolution denouncing Mr. Bryan and making fun of his candidacy for the Presidency. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, that is all I care to say now. I will not take up any more of the time of the House at present to answer other misstatements in the gentleman's speech, but at some future time I hope to have the pleasure of doing so.

Mr. DALZELL. I hope the gentleman from New York will have that pleasure. I just came in a few moments ago, and find my friend from New York engaged in his customary occupation of raising a tempest in a teapot. I did not say anything about Mr. Bryan or the Virginia Democratic Association, except that I found published in the Washington Post a certain statement which I read. That is all I said about it. That is absolutely true. The Washington Post published a preamble and resolution discussed at the meeting of the Virginia Democratic Association, as I recall it. Now, the gentleman does not deny that it was published in the Washington Post?

Mr. SULZER. Not at all; but the gentleman does not want it to go to the country as the voice, as he expressed it in his speech, of the Virginia Democratic Association simply because he happens to read it in some newspaper.

Mr. DALZELL. There was no misstatement of fact; it was in the Washington Post and the gentleman does not deny it, does he?

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman is begging the question. He said in his speech of yesterday—and that part of it was just read from the desk—"the Virginia Democratic Association voiced it in the following preamble and resolution." As a matter of fact, the Virginia Democratic Association did nothing of the kind.

Mr. DALZELL. Exactly so; I spoke of the gentleman from New Jersey and I spoke of the Virginia Association, and then I said, "I read in the Washington Post," and the gentleman does not deny that it was in the Post, does he?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, no; but I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not intend to have the country believe that everything that appears in the Post or some other newspaper is absolutely true?

Mr. DALZELL. God forbid. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I do not want the gentleman's misstatement to go unchallenged because he says he happened to read it in the Post or some other newspaper. I understand the Post merely gave the news that the preamble and resolution had been offered and rejected. I want to truth to go to the country through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I am opposed to having the Virginia Democratic Association placed in a false light, Mr. Bryan libeled, and the Democratic party misrepresented.

Mr. DALZELL. I am very sorry for the Democratic party, of course. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to give notice, now that we have got this episode out of the way, that I shall object to any further discussion not bearing upon the bill.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield while I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that he was through and has started out of the House. I was willing, after this was injected, for one on each side to discuss this outside matter, but if we are to get through with the bill we must confine the debate as near as possible, under the five-minute rule, to the matters affecting the provisions of the bill. I shall object hereafter to any outside debate.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it was with pleasure that I heard the statement made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that he had reserved the point of order to this new legislation relative to the pay of the enlisted men of the Army, and that he should feel called upon to eventually make that point of order. I say that it is with pleasure, not because of any hostility to the legislation itself, because so far as I have been able to understand it I am in hearty accord with it, but because I do consider that it is a very grave and dangerous violation of the customary and orderly method of doing business in this House. We have had quite an interesting discussion, interesting not only for the information that it conveyed, but for the many kinds of conflicting statements from the various members of the Military Affairs Committee as to what would be the effect of this new legislation. We have been given the privilege of reading four lines in the report of the committee on the bill as to what is contained in this new legislation, and I want to read to this committee those four lines to show with what preparation this Committee of the Whole is asked to vote the new legislation that will carry not only in this bill, but in all subsequent bills, an expenditure running anywhere from three millions and a half of dollars to five or ten millions of dollars. Here is the statement:

> Under the head of "Pay of enlisted men of the Army," in all grades, a full new schedule is inserted which makes an increase of $2 a month for the enlisted men and a very material increase of the pay of non-commissioned officers.

Now, that is the remarkable information conveyed to this committee. There is not a man in the sound of my voice, with the exception of members of that committee, who has anything like an accurate idea of what is imposed by this new legislation, and, judging by the statements made by the members of the committee, there are hardly any two of them agreed as to what is proposed. What is the reason given for this method of legislation? Somebody suggests that somewhere there is going to be made an effort to increase the pay of officers in addition to the pay of enlisted men, and in order that this House may not be forced to do something that it does not want to do it ought to put this provision upon an appropriation bill. I do not profess to be an expert in parliamentary law. I do not profess to know all the ins and outs of it, but it is going to require a little stronger statement than has been made to convince me that by bringing in the subject-matter of pay of enlisted men or officers upon an appropriation bill that must be passed we have strengthened the position of the House in regard to what we want to legislate as to such pay. Let it come in naturally in a bill legislating, and only legislating, and then if any other branch of the Government undertakes to block that legislation, all right. They may delay the proper increase to the enlisted men, but they will not be able to force their views upon us as the alternative of having no appropriation for the Army. That is common sense, and it does not require any parliamentary law to know it. If this committee was without legislative power—this Committee on Military Affairs—we might be a little bit more patient with them; but they have ample power.

The same men who report this bill could report to-morrow, if they saw fit, a bill dealing with this whole question, and they could then give to the House information as to what they are undertaking to do, which to-day the House is absolutely without. And to say that because some of us insist upon the orderly doing of things we are obstructing what may be a good purpose is to ignore the great, broad principles that underlie all legislative governments for the sake of a supposed temporary advantage or necessity. I not only hope that this point of order will be made, but should it come to the case where no one else feels as I do, I should myself feel obligated to make it, and I hope now that this House will not permit the adoption of a rule to do violence to our ordinary method of legislating. Let the Military Affairs Committee now understand, and let all the other committees having legislative powers understand, that they are to bring in matters of this nature in an orderly course, and not to come in here upon an appropriation bill with absolutely no information given to the committee and ask us to vote it through because they think no one wants to take the responsibility of stopping meritorious legislation.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Chairman, I want, in a word, to say to my friend, who has just taken his seat, that assuming for a moment that this provision goes out of the bill on a point of order, I would like to know if he desires in that manner to relegate to another body the legislative powers which ought to belong to this body?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; and I deny that that would be the effect of it.

Mr. CAPRON. And I assert it could not have any other effect.

Mr. SHERLEY. And will the gentleman answer me a question? Is it not within the power of the Committee on Military Affairs now to report to this House a bill relative to the pay of both enlisted men and officers, or either?

Mr. CAPRON. And the Committee on Military Affairs, with the judgment of men representing both sides of this House, have thought it best and most wise to bring in a provision in this way.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. CAPRON. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not proper and possible, having reported such a bill, to get it up for consideration in this House?

Mr. CAPRON. Why, certainly; and it is up for consideration, and let me tell the gentleman we are considering one simple item in the military appropriation bill, and that is for the pay of enlisted men.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will agree now to withdraw any sort of objection if the gentleman will state to this committee without correction, or rather will state so as to be in accordance with statements already made, what you are doing under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. CAPRON. I am making a five-minute speech vicariously.

Mr. SHERLEY. So far there have been no two of the committee who have agreed on it.

Mr. CAPRON. The gentleman who addressed the Committee of the Whole House on this proposition has stated and made an accurate reply to every question that has been asked.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman in charge of the bill himself said the statements made yesterday were made under a misapprehension as to what the provision was, and this morning he brought a statement here showing——

Mr. CAPRON. There was a statement made yesterday that there was no increase as high as 100 per cent, and it was ascertained by consultation between the gentleman from Virginia and the chairman of the committee that the company cooks had been increased 100 per cent.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. And musicians.

Mr. CAPRON. And musicians. I want to say to the gentleman that the committee, I believe, carefully and conscientiously considered every point of vantage which the House might have on this matter, and it believed that in presenting it in this way there will be more certainty of the passage of this absolutely necessary legislation, provided the House of Representatives desires to retain the Army of the United States, if it should proceed in this manner as an item for the pay of enlisted men, to which this proposition alone refers, rather than in a separate bill, which undoubtedly when it goes to another body would be brought back with an amendment proposing an increase of the commissioned officers of the Army.

Now, I do not deny that is just as righteous as this, and for that reason I believe that this matter should be brought before the House, should be acted upon in this way, and I am surprised that men who have the good of the Army at heart should object to this provision, knowing the fact that all we can get for the enlisted man in the way of pay and emoluments now is about $30 a month, $1 per day. We know that nearly 5,000 desertions in the Army occurred last year. We are not recruiting the sort of men in the Army we ought to have. We know that something must be done. The officers of the Army, those who are making a profound study of the question of enlistments in the Army, believe among the first things necessary is an increase in the pay. A man getting $13 a month is relegated to the $13 class and comes to feel he is a $13 man. This legislation at least shows that the Congress of the United States is thinking about him, is bringing him somewhere to the degree of the level of those outside of the Army, and that is the one reason why you and I should be almost regretful that our consciences make it necessary for us to raise a point of order upon this provision that the Committee on Military Affairs believes to be the method by which this matter should be brought to the attention of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota may proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] None is heard.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the committee should realize the viewpoint of the Committee on Military Affairs before finally determining the fate of this increase-of-pay proposition. This committee realizes, as has been stated so many times on this floor, that the Army of the United States has been and is in a very serious condition. During the past year there were 4,500 desertions, 12,000 discharged by expiration of term of service, and over 8,000 by disability or by order, or a total discharged last year of over 26,000 men. There was a shortage of 20,000 men in the Army of the United States outside of the Hospital Corps, and that about impairs the efficiency of the Army for more than the proportional decrease of its authorized strength. Under existing conditions it is impossible to recruit the right class of men, and when good men are recruited and fairly trained it is impossible to keep them in the Army; and these good men, so trained, are the real backbone of the Army. They are the efficient force, not only desirable but necessary to keep. Now, we all realize the necessity of a minimum efficient Army for the field service of the United States. Our situation in having tropical possessions fixes beyond question the fact of what must constitute a minimum efficient Army which we are obliged to maintain, and it is that fact that I wish this committee to consider first of all, and then how we can best do our duty in a legislative way and make it efficient. We have Porto Rico, way off in the southeast; we have Hawaii, in the center of the Pacific; we have the Philippines, on the other side of the Pacific, and then we have the Alaskan service, which is as bad on one side as the tropical service is on the other. Those outlying possessions are obliged to be garrisoned by an adequate minimum force, and that is practically determined by the force that is there now. It is not safe to have a smaller number of troops there, and there are many good reasons why more should be stationed. In addition to that, we have been obliged to garrison Cuba for the last few years, and, so far as we can tell, there will be obliged to be maintained by this Government an adequate garrison in that island for some time in the future.

There are about 5,000 men in Cuba now. There will be obliged to be maintained about 5,000 men for some years, so far as we can now foresee, not so much to protect the Cubans as to help them install their own government and properly perform their governmental functions. I know it is stated that the troops may be withdrawn next year about this time; but it is noticeable in the press dispatches from that island, in the reports of its government, and by those who are interested in all phases of Cuban affairs, that the United States must continue to maintain a moderate and efficient military force upon that island. We must remember, too, that after a little time the temporary force of marines must be withdrawn from Panama, and there must be substituted instead an adequate military force from the Regular Army. We are obliged to maintain about 12,000 troops in the Philippines. That number of troops, which must be maintained there, is the minimum, and there is always a possibility there should be more. These men must be replaced in the Tropics and must be replaced in Alaska about every two years. That is about the length of time that the officers consider is safe that the troops can be fairly maintained there, and then others must be sent from this country to replace them. In 1876 Congress fixed the number of troops necessary to be maintained within the United States at 25,000 men, and this number certainly should not be smaller now, when our country is nearly twice as large and the troops, though not needed to fight Indians, yet are needed for instruction and example and cooperation with the National Guard.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask if the gentlemen of this committee have considered the dangerous situation in Hawaii? We have only a small garrison there. There is a group of islands that is deemed absolutely necessary for the protection of the military interests of the United States and, as well, for the interests of our trade and commerce in the Pacific.

There is a population there of about 160,000, of which only about 4,000 are Americans and nearly 100,000 are Orientals. It is one of the lamentable conditions of to-day the world over that there does exist a race prejudice, increasing in some places almost to race antagonism, between men of different colored skins, between the white and the Oriental races; and that condition exists in Hawaii just as it does in California and in British Columbia, though not to the extent and with no outbreak up to this time. Many of those Orientals are accustomed to arms. Many of them are very intelligent men. They realize the possibilities of their controlling Hawaii just as much as we do. If, as our people did only about ten years ago, over night, that 100,000 Orientals should undertake to gain control of the Hawaiian Islands, it is very evident they could do it unless the United States maintained an adequate military force upon Hawaii to overawe every assailant and protect our interests, and if that once be done you realize that this wave of race antagonism, any wave of race prejudice, that might arise on both sides of the Pacific could not be subdued by even the strongest administration. The Government might not be able to subdue the wave of prejudice that would come from the vast mass of the people on both sides of the Pacific, and such a sudden wave, increased by the fact of the intense pressure of economic conditions, is always liable to create a condition of armed conflict. It is our duty to prevent any such condition. It is of the utmost importance, then, for this Government to maintain an adequate military force in Hawaii, in Cuba, in Porto Rico, in Panama, and the Philippines, and that such forces must be exchanged by fresh men from the United States full of the vigor from our own soil and climate. It must be replaced by new men every two years. Consequently we must always maintain, in the United States at least, a force equal to those in our possessions.

Mr. Chairman, we can not do it now. Our desertions are too frequent. We can not get recruits. We can not keep them. So this situation seemed to your Committee on Military Affairs a real emergency; something which should be met at once, to save our men, to preserve peace, and prevent the possibility of serious consequences.

Now, I agree with the general proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], as I very generally do outside of politics, but this is one of the situations which is a real national emergency, which demands legislation, if possible, by Congress at this session, to insure that the Army should have an ample supply of recruits of enlisted men to replace and maintain these troops in our tropical possessions. Now, how can we do it? Why do we not do it? It seems to me there are quite a number of things that ought to be done for the welfare of the enlisted men, but the most important of them all is to have the troops adequately paid. The officers of the Army who are responsible most for its affairs informed us that a pay scale like the present would probably insure them an adequate number of troops. For that reason, and for that reason only, this amendment was inserted in the bill. We all know there are several other things of great importance that ought to be corrected by legislation and by administration in the treatment of enlisted men. But they are not emergency measures. They can wait for the ordinary procedure of the House. But this is different; it is needed now, as soon as possible, and for that reason it was presented to this House by the appropriation bill, which must be passed for the support of the Army.

Now, let us consider for a moment some of the other suggestions as to what may happen if it be omitted or if it be passed. If it be passed by this House and if it be further amended by the Senate by inserting the officers' pay scale, it then must come back here for consideration by the House. The House can do as it pleases. It can send it back to the Committee on Military Affairs, back to the Committee of the Whole, and then to conference, with whatever instructions this committee or the House may choose to give. If it sends it to conference, as I presume it will and it ought to do, then it must come back, and will be subject to whatever action the House chooses to take at that time.

The point I desire to enforce is that some provision for pay for the enlisted men is absolutely necessary. Now, if that amendment or any other amendment by the Senate should come back to the House, that can be debated; any instructions that this House chooses can be given at that time; and if, as a last resort, no provision can be agreed upon, then the same thing can be done for the support of the Army as was done in 1876. The House can compel the passage of a joint resolution extending the appropriations of this year to cover the expenses for next year. So that there can be no failure, and when the appropriation is passed a proper pay bill will be a part of it. But suppose, on the other hand, as was maintained by the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, that this amendment ought to be omitted from the bill, as he has it in his power to cause to be done, what will happen? The Committee on Military Affairs will undoubtedly try to do their duty as they see it and report some sort of pay bill.

It will go on the Calendar, and remain on the Calendar, the graveyard of measures of this kind. If it were considered by the House on a motion to suspend the rules, it would not be subject to amendment; and a matter as important as this ought not to be taken up under a motion to suspend the rules. If considered by the House under a special rule, it must take the place of some other appropriation bill now crowding upon us, so fast upon us.

Here we have before us for consideration a bill for the support of the Army. Here is the proper time. We are considering military affairs. We have the proper information to consider the matter right now. We do not need more to frame proper legislation. Is it best to have it crowd out some other appropriation bill not connected at all with military matters when this is the proper time to consider the matter? For this is an emergency, needing help as soon as possible, as it seems to your committee which has presented it to you, appealing to your patriotism for the support and maintenance of the Army; for the welfare and possibly for the peace and safety of the country. Right now consider it, as it ought to be, as the basis of the military establishment, which should be the object of our constant solicitude and care. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, most of the speeches that have been made relative to this matter have been very good speeches in behalf of legislation increasing the pay of the enlisted men of the Army. To that extent they have been effective speeches, but to the proposition that confronts this committee they have been wide of the mark, with the exception of the closing remarks of the gentleman who has just preceded me.

I fail to see, as he does, all of the difficulties ahead of a bill properly reported; and I see a great many advantages in such a bill. In the first place, there is no use for us to get hysterical about the need of this bill. I believe you ought to have increased pay for the Army; but I know, and so does everyone else here, that you will have an Army, an efficient Army, whether this bill passes this year or not.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's argument just at this point, but I listened with interest to his colloquy with the gentleman from Rhode Island, and as I understood the gentleman, his objections to this provision were twofold. In the first place they arose from what he said was the fact, that this is not the proper way in which to bring the measure forward, and, in the second place, that he did not think the gentlemen of the committee who have charge of the matter could explain it. In other words, that the provision in the bill itself was uncertain. Now, the gentleman said, I think, that he would withdraw his objection if the gentleman from Rhode Island or those in charge of this measure could state exactly what it was, so that there would be no uncertainty as to just what this feature of the bill provided.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is nearly right. There are quite a number of minor and one or two major errors in his statement.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman admits that I am substantially right?

Mr. SHERLEY. But I have not admitted that.

Mr. HARRISON. "Substantially right," I think the gentleman said.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; the gentleman did not mean to say that.

Mr. HARRISON. Assuming——

Mr. SHERLEY. Assume, for the sake of your argument, and go ahead.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to ask the gentleman—and he is a great lawyer—whether there is not a maxim of law which says that that which may be rendered certain is certain? Now, his objection is to the uncertainty, as he calls it, of this provision. He bases his criticism upon the questions addressed by Members to the gentleman from Iowa, in charge of the bill, questions as to figures and numbers, requiring an answer as complicated as an answer to an arithmetical puzzle; questions that might have puzzled anyone. They were almost as puzzling as some of the hypothetical questions that are used in trials in the law courts; and because the gentleman who happened to be on his feet explaining an emergency measure was not able to give the gentleman the information he desired I do not think the gentleman has any right to suppose the committee have not information as to what the bill provides.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the suggestion of my friend from New York, it is true that it is an old maxim of the law that that is certain which is capable of being made certain. It is also legally true that a man can do by another what he can do by himself; and yet this maxim of the law would hardly be suggested in a legislative body as proof that a man can perform his duty by allowing somebody else to perform it for him.

Neither can any man here perform his duty in voting intelligently on what is contained in this proposition without knowing what it is, and not simply accepting the statement that it will be eventually shown to him what it is. The statement in the bill is not certain, however certain it may be made. The explanations in regard to it are not certain, and have not been harmonious, and nobody knows it better than those who have been present through this debate of two hours or more. There are now different opinions in the minds of men as to the extent of this legislation. Now, if this was a matter of overwhelming importance, I might not take the position that I do; but I know perfectly well that notwithstanding the need of it, we will have an Army, and we will have an efficient Army, whether this passes or not. I also know that most of the conditions which are reported in regard to the Army were reported when circumstances outside were very different from what they are to-day, and we are likely to have no trouble now in getting recruits. Now, that is no reason why we should not pay a man what he deserves. I want to pay him that, but I want to have this subject, which is a big subject, considered legitimately on its merits, or as the result of a report made by the Committee on Military Affairs. I think the Committee on Military Affairs owes it to the House to give us something more than four lines, telling us that they have made an increase of $2 as to the privates and substantial increases as to the noncommissioned officers, before they ask us to vote the increase.

Mr. HARRISON. I do the gentleman the credit of believing that he is entirely in sympathy with the general proposition to increase the pay of the enlisted men of the Army, but he seems to doubt whether it is a matter of pressing importance. I, for one, was convinced that it was, not only by the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], but through the remarks which we had in the House here yesterday. I do not know whether the gentleman was present or not when I read excerpts from the recent article in Everybody's Magazine about the Army situation.

Mr. SHERLEY. I was, and I will reply to the gentleman by saying that if I permitted my opinions to be based on what I see in Everybody's Magazine and similar magazines, I would think the country was going to the bow wows in a hurry in every direction.

Mr. HARRISON. I warn the gentleman that he would be wise if he would allow his opinions, in this instance, to be guided by that magazine.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am indebted to the gentleman for his gratuitous remark, but after all, while I do not hope to convince my friend from New York, nor do I hope to convince those who have taken this course, I have said what I have, not because it is pleasant for me to interfere, but because it has not been shown to my satisfaction that there is anything standing in the way of the Committee on Military Affairs properly reporting a bill and having it considered by this House in the proper way. The patriotism that the gentleman from Minnesota appeals to now, to induce Members to waive the rules and the proper procedure of the House, can properly be appealed to to get unanimous consent for consideration of such a bill properly reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAPRON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CAPRON. Does not the gentleman think his criticisms of the committee, when he says that all the information the Committee of the Whole can get about it is three lines in a report, is a little unfair, when there is not one item or schedule in this whole proposition of the increase of the pay of enlisted men which is not set forth item by item, and the bill has been read to the House, and the gentleman has it before him? Is it not a little unfair to say we have only given you three lines?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I think not.

Mr. CAPRON. Would the gentleman like us to repeat the bill in the report?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but the gentleman would have liked a report of this kind. He would have liked a report showing to the House exactly what the enlisted men and noncommissioned officers are now receiving not only in the way of regular pay, but in the way of extras; what they may earn as crack riflemen, as sharpshooters; what they get through their various enlistments, and then a comparative statement of what this bill would do in those various grades. I say that would be scientific and would give the House the information that it ought to have.

Mr. CAPRON. The statement only shows how futile it would be for any man to attempt it. I could not tell whether twenty-five or twenty-six men would qualify out of a company for rifle practice, and I could not tell whether they would reenlist.

Mr. SHERLEY. I did not ask the gentleman to enter the realm of prophecy. I do ask him, for I have sufficient faith in his ability, whatever his own faith may be to believe he can, to furnish a statement as to what the existing law is now and what change the proposed law would make.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. At the close of my remarks to-day I put in what I tried to put in yesterday, but did not complete. That is a statement of the exact pay received for each enlistment by which is fixed the amount under the present law and that under the proposed law. It will be in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman has done a creditable service that would have been much more creditable if it had been done by the committee. Then we could have read it before we took up the consideration of this matter, and not have to wait until to-morrow morning after we have passed its consideration.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We could postpone the consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is not a man here that does not know that the point is well made that this is not a proper way to legislate. But we are being told that some other body is going to be unpatriotic, that there is another branch of the legislative service that is going to willfully and wrongfully expend the people's money, and in order to protect the great House of Representatives from the big stick of the other legislative branch we must adopt this parliamentary status, and yet nobody has been able to show why that status would be any more effective than the ordinary regular method. This is all I desire to say. I have no desire to start a controversy which seems to have carried with it something of bitterness——

Mr. CAPRON. Not at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly on my part I have no desire to antagonize the committee, nor have I any criticism to make of the committee other than relates legitimately to the methods they are undertaking in this instance.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Chairman, after all has been said, is it the settled purpose of the gentleman from Kentucky to insist on his point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know that I will have to exercise the option, because it has been said by the gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. CAPRON. I think the gentleman from Minnesota has withheld his point of order. It is not worth while for the committee to continue this discussion if in the end the point of order is to be made.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I want to yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLLIDAY].

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Chairman, it has been impressed on us from various sources that the real objection to considering this question at this time is that gentlemen can not understand it. Now, when the gentleman from Kentucky or any other man in this House pretends that he can not understand at a single glance every provision contained in this paragraph, he does himself the grossest injustice. Nothing could be simpler. We provide for an increase of the enlisted pay of the privates of the Army from $13 up to $15, giving the master electrician $75, and we go in detail through every man in the Army except the officers and tell in detail what each man will get, and that requires no explanation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much does a master electrician get under the present law?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I have not the table before me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How are we going to understand what the increase is?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. He gets $75 a month, I am told. The point I make is that every gentleman in this House can make up his mind whether the pay we provide in this bill is adequate or not. It does not matter what the man has been getting; it does not matter what he might get; it does not matter what wages a soldier had a hundred years ago; the real question to be determined now is whether we are fixing a proper pay or not. If you think we are giving him too much, reduce it. If you think that he ought not to have his wages increased, vote down the provision.

The provision is open to amendment. I want to reiterate that proposition. It simply seems to me absurd to say that we can not vote intelligently upon as plain and simple a proposition as how much we shall pay. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] said a short time ago that we ought not to legislate upon these bills, and when he is reminded of the fact that he never brought in an appropriation bill in his life without legislating upon it, he says it is only a few men, a clerk here or there. Mr. Chairman, if we have a right to raise the pay of a single man, woman, or child on an appropriation bill, we have the same right to increase the pay of every man in the United States Army. The principle is exactly the same. We have no more right to increase the wages of a clerk one dollar on an appropriation bill, so far as the legality of the matter is concerned, than we have to take up every man in the Army and increase his pay. Mr. Chairman, I never was very badly scared about legislating upon an appropriation bill. I think it will be right and proper to legislate upon an appropriation in any case where the bill would go through by unanimous consent.

If I have been listening properly, if I have heard and understood what has been said during this debate, there is not a man in this Chamber who opposes this increase of pay. If that is true, what is the necessity of sending this bill back to the committee. We have studied it. Oh, they say, the committee has not given it proper consideration; and it seems to me some covert insinuation is thrown out that that committee has brought in this bill hastily. I want to say that no committee in this House has labored more carefully, more zealously or assiduously in the preparation of any bill than has the Committee on Military Affairs in the preparation of this bill and of this provision. And we have had the benefit of everybody who understands anything about it. The Secretary of War came down and urged it, and we practically followed his suggestions. The Chief of Staff urged the same thing upon us. We got information and light from every direction in which it was possible to obtain information, and we bring to you a carefully considered measure which the simplest mind can understand if it wants to. Mr. Chairman, I have observed that the objections raised here all come from the same committee, and I would suggest that in the future revision of the rules of this House we provide that no committee shall legislate upon an appropriation bill except the Appropriation Committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it would be very far from my purpose to criticise anyone for making a point of order on legislation in an appropriation bill. [Laughter.] Yet, Mr. Chairman, it is not infrequent that I watch legislative items upon appropriation bills emanating from this committee and that committee, and sometimes from the Appropriation Committee without making or insisting upon the point of order. Now, here is a practical situation. I would like very much to have the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and I want to congratulate the Appropriation Committee upon his acquisition to its ranks. This is a practical question. For the next month, in all likelihood, this House will necessarily be engaged constantly in the consideration of appropriation bills, with the exception of District business, and, perhaps occasionally, motions to suspend the rules on suspension day. There are yet to be considered the post-office appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill, the agricultural, the fortification, the sundry civil, the consular and diplomatic, the District, and the pension bill, which last will take only a very short time. These appropriation bills will consume the time of the House for the next three weeks, probably six weeks. That means that without a special rule being brought into the House, if the Committee on Military Affairs should report a special bill upon this subject to-morrow it could not possibly be considered in the House for six weeks or two months, which would bring it to the very last end of the session.

If a special bill should come in and be considered at the last end of the session, considered under a rule of the House, it goes to the Senate and goes into conference, absolutely without any protection on the part of the House to consider it. The Military Committee, feeling as every committee does, that it must obtain legislation along the lines of its committee work, feeling that it must provide resources for the Army in the present situation—the Military Committee, aye, the House itself, in the last days of the session will surrender at least to a compromise. Well, if this item remains in this bill the House is forewarned—and being forewarned, is forearmed—and no matter, in my judgment, what the Senate may do, the House can have its own way about this increase in pay, if the item remains in the appropriation bill. If it goes out of the appropriation bill, and is not restored under a rule of the House, it means not merely the increase in the pay provided in this bill, but means a further increase such as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and myself and many others are very much opposed to. Strategically we are in a stronger position with the item in this bill now than we would be with it in a special bill, because I believe the House ought to determine this question; it being a question coming very close to the people, I believe we ought to leave it in this bill and have our way about it in this bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word and then call for a ruling. I want to say that I think the gentleman from Kentucky was disposed to pettifog a little, something he very rarely does on this floor, in referring to the difference between the gentleman from Virginia and myself in regard to the percentage paid the men, when, as a matter of fact, there was no difference. The gentleman referred to the 100 per cent increase; part was to cooks and part to the regimental bands, and my reference in regard to the percentage was to the enlisted force. As a matter of fact, these cooks and bands, or musicians, are part of the enlisted force, but the committee treated them as a separate class of men and made the increase there on different lines than we did in the regular enlisted force in the Army. It was a very mild difference and a very mild mistake——

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will know that the gentleman from Kentucky had no special reference to that particular instance, and the gentlemen will bear me out, and this committee will bear me out, in the statement that there has been for three hours to-day and yesterday a constant discussion between members of the committee as to just what was done by the bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That comes largely from the fact that tables have been prepared hastily, but the main provisions of the bill are set out so fully that by a careful figuring there can be no mistake as to the result. The amount fixed for each grade is the important point. The totals are certain. Every class is fixed in this bill, and later provisions in the bill, which have not been reached yet, fix the increase for each reenlistment, and it is a mere computation——

Mr. SHERLEY. None of us have the tables except the distinguished gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We have tables of the increase for each grade and tables of the whole amount. I have a table here, from which I read to-day, and I ask, Mr. Chairman, that it be inserted in my remarks.

I only want to say this in conclusion, that if there is a certainty of legislation this year for increased pay for the enlisted men of the Army, the only way to guarantee that increase, in my judgment, is to permit this provision to remain in the bill. Now, as I have stated before, the committee felt it its duty to bring this measure before the House. Our responsibility ceases now. As I said before, the responsibility of the membership of the House begins with each individual Member as to the fate of the measure. If the point is insisted upon, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been raised. Is the point of order insisted upon?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I understood I had the right to insert that table in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? [After a pause.] None is heard.

The table is as follows:

Table showing comparative cost of a company of infantry during the civil war, the Spanish-American war, and that now proposed.

Grade.	No.	Civil war.		Spanish war.		Present proposed pay.
		Rate.	Cost.	Rate.	Cost.	Rate.	Cost.

Total	128		2,106		2,079.60		2,151

[a] Sergeant. [b] Private detailed.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. In order that the exact additional expense in time of war which would be brought about by this bill will be thoroughly understood, attention is invited to the table of comparison between the several rates of pay for enlisted men during the civil war, the Spanish war, and that now proposed.

A company of infantry would under existing law consist of 128 enlisted men, and the total pay of such a company at the rates established during the last year of the civil war would have been $2,106 per month. The cost of such a company at the rates established during the Spanish war would have been $2,079.60 per month. The cost of such a company at the rates established by this bill would be $2,151 per month—that is, a company of infantry in time of war paid according to the schedule established in this bill would cost $45 a month or, roughly, 30 cents per month per man more than it would cost under the rates existing during the last year of the civil war, and $92 per month, or 75 cents per month per man, more than it would cost at the rates established during the Spanish war. The rates per month per man for a company of infantry would be the same for an army of a million men. When these figures are taken into consideration in connection with the enormous cost of prosecuting a war, it is seen that the increased cost is absolutely negligible. These figures are made on the assumption that the men were all in their first enlistment. If it be assumed that the war lasted for a long time, and that the men are all drawing "length-of-service pay," the figures would not be essentially different. For instance, under the schedule now proposed, if the entire Army were serving in its second enlistment, and had had five years of service, the additional cost for length of service under this schedule would be actually less than it would be under the schedule of pay in existence during the Spanish-American war.

In this connection it should be borne in mind that less than one-sixth of the strength of the Army would be noncommissioned officers, and, therefore, $5 added to the pay of each noncommissioned officer would not amount to a total as much as that obtained by adding $1 to the pay of each private. It should also be remembered that during the Spanish-American war each enlisted man in the United States drew 20 per cent increase on his pay for "service in war," which provision is eliminated by this act.

There is an absolutely unanimous belief on the part of Army experts that the principal increase in pay should be made for the noncommissioned officers along the general lines provided in this bill. A dollar or two added to the pay of the private will accomplish very little, but five or ten dollars added to the pay of each noncommissioned officer will accomplish the maximum good due the service for such an expenditure of money.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in charge of the bill insinuates that if the rules of the House are insisted upon the Committee on Military Affairs, in reporting this provision in an appropriation bill contrary to these rules, has discharged its duty and that nothing more will be done in respect to the increase of the pay of the enlisted men of the Army, and that its duty in this respect has been discharged. Now, the gentleman from Iowa can not frighten anybody here from doing what they believe to be right by threatening to refuse to exercise the legislative jurisdiction of his committee on this subject. He knows, as well as every other Member in this House, that this provision is brought in here contrary to the rule that prohibits the reporting of any legislation of this character upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for one question right there?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Within the last three years, is it not true the gentleman himself stated to the Chair when a point of order was made that unless he could get a rule he could not pass half the provisions of the bill then before the committee?

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman is correct in respect to the legislative appropriation bill presented in the first session of the last Congress, when certain members of the Committee on Military Affairs were somewhat disturbed about the rules at that time, because the rules of the House had just previously been enforced against their committee on the Army appropriation bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, what I want to say is this: The Committee on Military Affairs, unlike the Committee on Appropriations, has legislative jurisdiction. It is entirely competent, not only competent, but it is their duty, to take up and consider all matters pertaining to the Army and report to the House all the legislation deemed necessary. But it is not their duty to use their appropriation bill as a vehicle for carrying their legislation. This practice has grown to such an extent that these committees attempt to carry all their legislation on their appropriation bills and report no legislative bills whatever. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, when they deem an increase in the salary of the Revenue-Cutter Service or the Light-House Service necessary and just, bring in bills authorizing that increase. They do not try to put it onto an appropriation bill by rule or otherwise, and thereby coerce Congress into enacting legislation or withholding appropriations.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG. Do I understand that the gentlemen from the Committee on Appropriations have reformed, and that in the future they will not place any legislative provisions on appropriation bills?

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Michigan knows very well that the Committee on Appropriations has no legislative jurisdiction, and the Committee on Appropriations has never yet reported in an appropriation bill a new legislative proposition entirely independent of the administration of public expenditure. There is a great deal of difference between incorporating legislation in an appropriation bill proposing to reclassify and increase the salary of all the employees in the Government service and a proposition to increase the salary of one or two employees who by reason of increased services are entitled to increased compensation. All legislation carried on bills reported from the Committee on Appropriations is intended either to limit, reduce, or safeguard public expenditure or to improve administrative methods of expenditure.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. The fact remains always that any Member of the House can object or make the point of order against the proposed legislation, but the committee has never proposed to legislate independent of the administration of public expenditures or along general legislative lines, as is here proposed. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Did not the gentleman have in the urgent deficiency bill an item of legislation about the payment of the cost of a certain trial here, which went out, and he insisted it was not the action of the House? And did he not have in the legislative bill an item which went out on a point of order which I made in reference to a reorganization to a certain extent in the Interior Department?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir. That related to the administration of public expenditure.

Mr. MANN. That having gone out, is the gentleman going to take the position that it ought to go in if put in by the Senate, it having been stricken out in the House? I will watch with a great deal of interest to see what the gentleman's position is on that proposition.

Mr. TAWNEY. Strategically the House will be in a much better position, I contend, to ultimately carry out the will of the House in respect to the increase of the salary of the entire branch of the military service if we send to the Senate a clean appropriation bill—an appropriation bill free from this proposed legislation—than we otherwise will be; and for that reason I shall insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The very clear, lucid, and somewhat prolonged discussion of the point of order during the last three hours has made it very easy for the Chair to reach a conclusion and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That any soldier who receives an honorable discharge at the termination of an enlistment period and reenlists within three months thereafter shall be entitled to continuous-service pay as herein provided, which shall be in addition to the initial pay provided for in this act and shall be as follows, namely: An increase of $3 monthly pay for and during the second and third enlistments each, and a further increase of $1 for and during each subsequent enlistment up to and including the seventh, after which the pay shall remain as in the seventh enlistment: Provided, That any soldier who receives an honorable discharge at the termination of his first or any succeeding enlistment period and reenlists after the expiration of three months shall be regarded as in his second enlistment; that an enlistment shall not be regarded as complete until the soldier shall have made good any time lost during an enlistment period by unauthorized absences exceeding one day, but any soldier who receives an honorable discharge for the convenience of the Government after having served more than half of his enlistment shall be considered as having served an enlistment period within the meaning of this act; that the present enlistment period of men now in service shall be determined by the number of years continuous service they may have had at the date of approval of this act, under existing laws, counting three years to an enlistment: And provided further, That any soldier who has been honorably discharged and reenlists within three months of the date of said discharge shall, upon such reenlistment, receive an amount equal to three months' pay at the rate he was receiving at the time of his discharge.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That enlisted men now qualified or hereafter qualifying as marksmen shall receive $2 per month; as sharpshooters, $3 per month; as expert riflemen, $5 per month; as second-class gunners, $2 per month; as first-class gunners, $3 per month; as gun pointers, gun commanders, observers second class, chief planters and chief loaders, $7 per month; as plotters, observers first class, and casemate electricians, $9 per month, all in addition to their pay, but no enlisted man shall receive at the same time additional pay for more than one of the classifications named in this section: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to increase the total number of gun pointers, gun commanders, observers, chief planters, chief loaders, plotters, and casemate electricians now authorized by law.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the Chair will entertain the proposition, I would suggest that these new provisions, on pages 9 and 10, down to line 22, on page 10, be considered as read, and I will make the point of order on them to save time.

The CHAIRMAN. How about the point of order on the paragraph, "That increase of pay for service beyond the limits of the States comprising the Union, and the Territories of the United States contiguous thereto, shall be as now provided by law?" The Chair sees no reason why it should be in there, but the Chair sees no way of striking it out on the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike it out.

Mr. BONYNGE. I move to strike out lines 14, 15, 16, and 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves to strike out the lines.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That should be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 14, 15, 16, and 17, on page 9.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one provision included that could stand by itself.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the pay during first enlistment of enlisted men of bands, exclusive of the band of the United States Military Academy, shall be as follows:

Chief musician, $75; principal musicians and chief trumpeters, $40; sergeants and drum majors, $36; corporals, $30; and privates, $24; and the continuous-service pay of all grades shall be as provided in this act: Provided, That Army bands or members thereof shall not receive remuneration for furnishing music outside the limits of military posts when the furnishing of such music places them in competition with local civilian musicians.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, Is that not a new provision?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Absolutely.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then I make the point of order on it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman that it was put in to protect civilian bands from competition with military bands.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want to ask whether this is subject to a point of order, and whether the point of order has been made against it?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been made against it by the gentleman from Minnesota, and the gentleman from Iowa concedes the point of order is well taken. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to increase the pay of enlisted men now on the retired list.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Chairman, while that is not subject to the point of order, it is wholly useless, and I move to strike out the lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out lines 6 and 7, on page 10.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That sections 1280, 1281, and 1284 of the Revised Statutes be, and are hereby, repealed, and so much of section 4819 as pertains to the deduction of 12½ cents per month from the pay of every soldier of the Regular Army for the benefit of the Soldiers' Home be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to reserve the point of order upon that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask the gentleman if that is new?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, yes; it is all new. It is all subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does anyone make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 6 of the act entitled, "An act for the better organization of the Army of the United States" be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That any soldier who deserts shall, besides incurring the penalties now attaching to the crime of desertion, forfeit all right to pension which he might otherwise have acquired."

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order on that.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17288, the Army appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.
